PARIS, May 18, 1934.

The PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C.:

I beg you to make the French Chamber of Deputies a party to the moving and high testimony of fidelity given by the American Congress to the memory of La Fayette, whose name will remain forever the symbol of that Franco-American friendship which the magnificent part taken by the United States during the war in the common defense of right and liberty has rendered faultless henceforth.

FERDNAND BUISSON,
President of the Chamber of Deputies.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask to have read, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 246) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I present and ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD and appropriately referred a paper in the nature of a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Middle Atlantic Conference of Congregational and Christian Churches.

There being no objection, the paper in the nature of a resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Middle Atlantic Conference of Congregational and Christian Churches urges the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to report at once to the Senate the three World Court treaties which have been in its hands since 1930; and earnestly requests the Senate to give its consent to the ratification of these protocols before the present session adjourns, so that this issue, which has been pending before the Senate in some form for 11 years, may be settled and the 1932 pledges of both parties for adherence to the World Court fulfilled without further delay.

CONTROL OF CHINCH BUGS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] and myself, to introduce a joint resolution of an emergency character, which I ask may be read and lie on the table until I may have an opportunity to ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution will be read.

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to apply such methods of control of chinch bugs as in his judgment may be essential to accomplish such purposes, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals, there is hereby appropriated and made immediately available $1,000,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be used for expenditures of general administration and supervision, purchase and transportation of materials used for the control of chinch bugs, and such other expenses as in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture may be deemed necessary, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and rent outside the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the cooperating State shall be responsible for the local distribution and utilization of such materials on privately owned land, including full labor costs: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture no part of this appropriation shall be expended for chinch-bug control in any State until such State has provided the necessary organization for the cooperation herein indicated: Provided further, That procurements under this appropriation may be made by open-market purchase notwithstanding the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of farm animals, farm crops, or other property injured or destroyed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 245), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study with a view to determining:

(1) The feasibility and advisability of a Federal sales tax on all articles, except foodstuffs, sold in the United States by the producer, manufacturer, or importer thereof, and levied with the object of allocating a proportion thereof to States which do not levy and/or collect, and which do not permit their respective political subdivisions to levy and/or collect, any production, manufacture, and/or sales tax on articles subject to such Federal tax.

(2) What provisions or limitations should be contained in such Federal sales tax with reference to any or all such articles.

(3) What articles should be defined as foodstuffs for the purposes of such tax.

(4) What portion of the receipts from such Federal sales tax should be allocated to the States, and the basis and method of allocating such portion to the individual States eligible therefor.

(5) The methods to be used in collecting such Federal tax.

(6) The method of ascertaining the sale price of all articles subject to such tax.

In making such study the committee shall consider all factors bearing upon such a tax program, with particular reference to any revision which may be necessary in the tariff laws.

The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its study, together with its recommendations for necessary legislation in connection with such tax program.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third and succeeding Congresses until the submission of its final report, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2100) to provide for the commemoration of the Battle of Big Dry Wash, in the State of Arizona, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

UTAH POWER & LIGHT CO.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, recently I received a letter from the secretary of the Consumers League of my State, an organization which is interested in questions affecting the public welfare. It is particularly interested in public utilities. The secretary requested that I have placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement signed by a number of citizens of my State and addressed to the directors of the Utah Power & Light Co. I intended that this statement, after having been placed in the RECORD, should be referred to the Federal Trade Commission, which has for some time been investigating certain public utilities. After communicating with the members of the Commission I am advised that they have practically completed their investigation and are now preparing a report for submission to Congress. I have also conferred with the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and with members of that committee, and he and they are of the opinion that the statement should be referred to such committee.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and be transmitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate for consideration and appropriate action upon its part.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 28, 1934.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
Utah Power & Light Co., City.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, being holders of 6 and/or 7 percent preferred stock of Utah Power & Light Co., and representing only their own stock, make the following requests of the directors of the Utah Power & Light Co., and request an acknowledgment and answer to this letter:

1. That the contract between the Utah Power & Light Co. and the Electric Bond & Share Co. for managerial and other services be canceled.

(The Utah Power & Light Co. has paid to the Electric Bond & Share Co. for such services the following amounts:

In the year 1932	145,343.00
In the year 1931	159,163.00
In the year 1930	181,386.00
In the year 1929	166,530.00

These figures secured from the Utah Power & Light Co. and the Utah Public Utilities Commission.

These fees, we understand, are largely based on a percentage of the gross revenue received by the company. (Reference: P. 1688, Report of Federal Trade Commission of July 15, 1932.) It is contended by these stockholders that any services rendered by the Electric Bond & Share Co., if any such services are necessary, should be paid for by the Utah Power & Light Co. for actual services only and not on a percentage of gross revenue received by the Utah Power & Light Co.

2. That a proper retirement reserve be set aside each year.

(In the past the amount set up for retirement reserve has greatly varied. In the year 1931 the retirement reserve was cut to $500,000 from $700,000 in the previous year and a dividend of $900,000 was paid on common stock, and in the year 1932 the retirement reserve was cut to $300,000 and a dividend of $150,000 was paid on common stock.

In the year 1932, retirement reserve	300,000

3. That the preferred-stock holders be given the right to select three fourths of the members of the board of directors.

In the report of the Federal Trade Commission made July 15, 1932, pages 1686 and 1687, referring to the Utah Power & Light Co., the following is stated (quoting from Federal Trade Commission report):

"As successor by reorganization to Utah Securities Corporation, Electric Power & Light Corporation became and continued to be the owner of all outstanding common stock of the Utah Power & Light Co. The total inflation of $34,330,246 is equal to all of the $30,000,000 book value of common stock and $4,330,246, or 16.8 percent, of the book value of preferred stock outstanding on December 31, 1930."

These stockholders have not sufficient information at this time to confirm the figures of the Federal Trade Commission and do not necessarily agree with them; nevertheless it is believed that the greatest equity in the property lies in the preferred-stock holders.

1933	None.

(This information obtained in letter dated Jan. 2, 1934, from G. M. Gadsby, president Utah Power & Light Co.) These dividends were paid without plainly disclosing this fact in the annual published report to preferred-stock holders of the company, with the exception of the year 1932, which showed dividend payment on the common stock of $150,000.

4. That one half of the common stock now held in the Utah Power & Light Co. by the Electric Bond & Share Co. be distributed pro rata to the preferred-stock holders.

(By this means the preferred stock, with this one-half interest in the common stock, would have voting control of the property.)

We believe that the management should set aside out of earnings a reserve for the payment of dividends on the preferred stock. We have faith in the property; we favor proper and strict regulation by the public service commission, with justice and fairness to the public, to the company's employees, and the shareholders.

The company is faced with difficult economic and climatic conditions, opposition to the public-utility industry, and constant demand for lower rates. In addition, there is dissatisfaction on the part of many preferred-stock holders due to the acts of the management of the company. We believe that the people of this State are willing that a public utility receive a fair return on an investment fairly established and that the influence of the large number of resident preferred-stock holders will be great if exerted in a just cause. It is believed by these stockholders that if this corporation is directed and operated by the preferred-stock holders, 10,000 of whom reside in this territory, that, with such management, cooperation with the public and customers would be secured, which would give reasonable rates to the consumer, reasonable wages to the employees, and a reasonable return to the stockholders.

Sincerely,

ERNEST BAMBERGER, Salt Lake City, Utah.
PATRICK HEALY, Ogden, Utah.
JOHN A. MARSHALL, Salt Lake City, Utah.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD AND DRUGS

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum in regard to Senate bill 2800, submitted by various associations and members of the cosmetic industry, relating to food, drug, and cosmetic control.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

MEMORANDUM IN REGARD TO SENATE BILL 2800, SUBMITTED BY THE UNDERSIGNED ASSOCIATIONS AND MEMBERS OF THE COSMETIC INDUSTRY

To the honorable the Members of the United States Senate:

GENTLEMEN: We respectfully submit the following memorandum in regard to S. 2800, relating to food, drug, and cosmetic control, now before the Senate for consideration, and in doing so beg leave to say that in our judgment, and in the judgment of the cosmetic industry generally, legislation of the character proposed, if properly framed, will be of advantage to the legitimate members of the industry as well as to the public, in that it will give full protection to health and tend to relieve the public of apprehension in regard to the character of cosmetic products permitted in interstate commerce. The public is clearly entitled to the elimination of cosmetics, as well as of drugs, which are dangerous to health, and if the bill is so framed as to accomplish this purpose, it is bound to be to the lasting advantage of both the public and the industry.

There are, however, at least two particulars in which the bill in its present form is plainly unjust to the industry, without in any way adding to the protection of the public. What we have to say in addition is by way of what we hope are constructive suggestions, which would, we believe, assist in effecting the purposes of the act. Concretely, our objections are as follows:

ADULTERATED COSMETICS

In defining what is an adulterated cosmetic in section 5 (a), the bill uses language unnecessarily involved, which may be expected to give rise to conflicting interpretation causing unnecessary hardship to the industry and interfering with the effective administration of the act. It seems obvious to us that as the only legitimate purpose of such a definition is to protect health, a provision applying to cosmetics the language of section 4 (a), which defines an adulterated drug, and as proposed at the hearing (hearings, pp. 258–261), is all that is necessary to accomplish this purpose. We suggest, therefore, that for the section as reported there be substituted the following:

"SEC. 5. A cosmetic shall be deemed to be adulterated—(a) If it is dangerous to health under the conditions of use prescribed in the labelling thereof, or if no conditions of use are thus prescribed, then under such conditions of use as are customary or usual."

Everything that is dangerous to health is included in this definition. As stated, it follows the language of the provision in regard to drugs, with the addition of the words emphasized, and it must be evident that if the language is sufficient in the case of drugs, it is sufficient in the case of cosmetics as well, for the dangers to health from the use of drugs are obviously greater than the dangers to health from the use of cosmetics, since drugs are used largely internally, and cosmetics entirely externally.

In connection with cosmetics, the head of the present Food and Drug Administration, Mr. Campbell, stated at the hearing that the definition provided by the bill of adulteration in cosmetics was "more exacting" than in the case of drug products, and in discussing the subject he referred to instances of disastrous injury which he said had resulted from the use of certain cosmetics (hearings, Feb. 27 to Mar. 3, 1934, p. 546). He seemed to assume that the prevention of such injuries in the case of cosmetics required the use of more sweeping language than that provided in the case of drugs. It is respectfully submitted however, that all of the cases which he so vividly presented were obviously due to cosmetics dangerous to health, and would therefore come within the definition of an adulterated cosmetic which we have suggested. If it is sufficient to define an adulterated drug as one that is "dangerous to health", it is also sufficient to use the same language in defining an adulterated cosmetic, and clearly in both cases the definition adequately protects the public.

Our specific objection to the provision as it now stands is that it naturally gives rise to variety of interpretations, some of which would be most injurious to the industry, and while we do not believe that such interpretation would be sustained by courts of last resort, it must be remembered that we are dealing with a criminal statute, and those engaged in the industry are entitled to have the language of the statute so clear as to leave no doubt as to its meaning. The provision of the bill as reported is as follows:

"SEC. 5. A cosmetic shall be deemed to be adulterated (a) if it bears or contains any poisonous or deleterious substance in such quantity as may render it injurious to the user under the conditions of use prescribed in the labeling thereof, or under such conditions of use as are customary or usual."

Preperly construed, this is probably unobjectionable, but according to one interpretation the words "as may render it injurious to the user" may mean as may possibly render it injurious to any user, an interpretation placed upon it by Mr. Campbell himself (hearings, p. 547).

That such a provision would be arbitrary, injurious, unreasonable, and indefensible seems very clear. There are few, if any, cosmetics even within the broad definition of the bill, which includes soap and all other cleansing materials, which when applied to the skin may not in some circumstances and with some people result in irritation or injury, no matter how innocuous the substance may be. A similar definition as to drugs would probably likewise ban a large number of medicinal preparations which are obviously proper and useful.

Mr. Campbell referred to the suggestion that word "average" be used, making the paragraph read "injurious to the average user." We quite agree that such a provision would be insufficient, because the term "average" might leave outside the definition cases of cosmetics or drugs which would be injurious to a great many people, although not injurious to the "average." It is submitted that a drug or cosmetic ought not to be put under the ban, where it is not dangerous to health in itself, and only results in irritation or injury because of some supersensitivity or idiosyncracy in cases so rare as to be negligible. Long lists of wholesome foods and harmless drugs have frequently been suggested which are, in such cases, injurious to the user.

It is perfectly obvious that under the definition as it now appears in the bill, if interpreted as suggested, the Food and Drug Administration could bar from interstate commerce numerous cosmetics which have never been considered, and are not, dangerous to health or harmful to the user, merely on its assumption that they might be harmful to some one or more users, no matter how rare the case or remote the possibility.

The reported definition would inevitably give rise to large numbers of civil claims and administrative complaints absolutely without foundation, based on the definition and its interpretation by claims' attorneys to the effect that any user who can possibly assert a casual relation between some alleged injury and the use of a particular cosmetic is entitled not only to maintain a civil action for damages but to cause as well criminal proceedings to be instituted against the manufacturer, and to make demand upon the Secretary of Agriculture that the products be suppressed. A field would thus be opened up where the possibilities of blackmail and nuisance actions are unlimited, and legitimate industries would be exposed to wholly needless and unjustified expense and litigation.

MULTIPLE SEIZURES

The bill provides for seizures of any article of food, drug, or cosmetic in interstate commerce that is adulterated or misbranded, or manufactured, processed, or packed in a factory not holding a valid permit. The multiplicity of such seizures may well in certain instances destroy the business of the manufacturer or otherwise result in irreparable injury. It is submitted that the provisions of section 19 (c) which seek to avoid such a result are too narrow for the purpose. It is noted in the first place that the jurisdiction given the district courts is to restrain by injunction the institution of more than one seizure, whereas it should include jurisdiction to restrain the prosecution of more than one where more than one seizure action has been begun. Moreover, it is limited to cases of misbranding only. It seems clear that the district courts ought to be invested with power to restrain the institution or prosecution of more than one seizure action in any case where it is convinced that the public interest will not thereby be adversely affected, and that the ends of justice require it to be done. Therefore, we ask that section 19 (c) be changed to read as follows:

Further to avoid multiplicity of libel for condemnation proceedings without impairing the protection of the public or the opportunity for prompt trial on the merits of alleged violations, the district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction as hereinafter provided the institution or prosecution of more than one seizure under section 16 where in the judgment of the court the issuing of such an injunction will not adversely affect the interests of the public and the ends of justice require such action.

It is noted that the foregoing provision does not require such action on the part of the court, but merely allows it to issue the injunction in the exercise of its judicial discretion.

THE REGULATORY POWER

By way of constructive criticism, it is suggested that section 10 (a) which, at present, touches only the question of tolerances and the power to determine them, might well be broadened so as to include the power to prescribe other conditions of use to safeguard the public health. By way of illustration, the manufacturer of cosmetics might be required in certain cases to give instructions and directions in regard to their use, and in some cases, require tests to avoid irritation due to hypersensitivity, as has been done in New York City.

Such a broadening of the regulatory powers would seem to be in the public interest and could be accomplished by merely adding at the end of section 10 the words "and in connection with such tolerances, or otherwise, he may prescribe other conditions for the protection of health."

THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC HEALTH

We also suggest that the efficient administration of the act would be assisted if there were added to the Committee on Public Health, as provided for in section 22, one or more members of each of the three industries subject to regulation, with the industry member or members empowered to sit with the committee only when consideration is being given to his or their particular industry. To accomplish this, it is suggested that there be added after the words "to their political affiliation", in section 22, subparagraph (6), line 5, page 37, the following: "2 members to be selected by the President from the food-producing—processing—and manufacturing industry, 2 from the drug industry, and 2 from the cosmetic industry, all of whom shall be selected for their scientific attainment and training in their respective industries. The members thus chosen from an industry shall sit as members of the committee only when regulations and matters concerning their own industry are under consideration."

It is perfectly clear that the industry members thus selected by the President would be in accord with the purposes of the act and capable of rendering constructive aid in the formulation of regulations, on account of their scientific training and familiarity with the history and conditions of the industry, and that, in many instances, they would be able to call to the attention of the Secretary and the committee conditions needing correction, which might otherwise escape notice, and to point out how such conditions could best be dealt with for the protection of the public without injury to the industry. The conclusions of a committee thus constituted would carry greater weight with the courts, and assure their more ready acceptance by the industry itself. In this way, enforcement of regulations through acquiescence would, in a large measure, be substituted in place of enforcement through prosecution.

ADMINISTRATION

Our final suggestion is that the bill be amended by substituting the Secretary of Commerce for the Secretary of Agriculture. In support of the proposal, we may point out, among other things, the fact that the natural growth of the Department of Agriculure has been so great as to make it impossible for the Secretary to give active attention to all its activities even in normal times, and that his duties under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and arising out of the present emergency absolutely preclude him from giving any active attention to the administration of food, drugs, and cosmetic legislation.

At the hearings objection was voiced to this proposal on the grounds that the administration of the Food and Drug Act had for 25 years been in the hands of the Food and Drug Administration, and it was not desirable to change that situation. We had no intention to suggest that the matter be taken out of the hands of that body. Our thought is that this bill puts three great industries having a volume of billions of dollars, under Governmental administration and direction and they are entitled to have the control placed in the hands of a Cabinet officer whose circumstances would permit him to give their affairs his active and personal consideration. At the hearing before the sub-committee the Secretary of Agriculture said: "My own time has been taken up so exclusively with emergency matters in the field of agriculture and national recovery that I have not had an opportunity to give this measure the degree of study and active support it deserves." As is also well known, he has been obliged to put the active conduct of processing and compensating tax matters and other functions of the greatest importance in the hands of subordinates, although the law contemplated that they should be performed by himself.

The matter of this bill was deemed a proper one for the consideration of the Committee on Commerce and not the Committee on Agriculture, and, in fact, it concerns commerce and public health alone, and is in no way concerned with the functions of the Department of Agriculture, which was created "to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of the word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants."

Control of cosmetics and control of drugs lie wholly outside of the normal functions of the Department of Agriculture and the sort of control of food that is given by the present act lies outside of agricultural functions. The whole matter relates to commerce and the conduct of commerce among the States, and comes directly within the scope and purpose of the Department of Commerce, both as stated in the act creating it and in practice. Chapter 10 of title 5 of the United States Code provides for a Department of Commerce, and section 3 states that "it shall be the province and duty of said Department to foster, promote, and develop the foreign and domestic commerce, etc." Clearly, so far as foods, drugs, and cosmetics are concerned, the Government ought to have two objectives, viz: To protect the public health and to foster commerce. Neither of these matters is in any way a function of the Department of Agriculture. The interest of the farmer in the matter is identical with those who live in cities, towns, and villages. Obviously with respect to food, the primary need of protection lies with the urban and not the rural class. That the administration is now nominally in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture is an accident. To place the supervision of the act in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce would not require the transfer of the Food and Drug Administration to his Department either physically or administratively. It is assumed that if the Secretary of Commerce were given this responsibility, the Food and Drug Administration would remain where it is now and function as it does now, with the exception that instead of being a practically autonomous body it would have the benefit of the active supervision of the head of the Department officially concerned, viz, commerce.

It is no argument against this suggestion that the Food and Drug Administration is housed in 1 of the 6 acres of buildings now used by the Department of Agriculture. The bureaus and divisions of the Interior Department, for instance, are very widely scattered.

Nor is there any reason why the Secretary of Commerce and the Food and Drug Administration should not have all the advantages of the facilities of the Bureau of Animal Industry which the Food and Drug Administration now enjoys.

Here it may be suggested that the purpose of the act probably requires the active assistance of the Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce, but there seems to be no practical or administrative difficulty in utilizing the functions of bureaus and divisions in different departments of the Government in order to carry out the purpose of this or any similar act. The Bureau of Public Health Service is a bureau in the Treasury Department, but there seems to be no reason why the facilities of that Bureau may not be used in the administration of the Food and Drug Act, despite the fact that it is not under the Secretary of Commerce or the Secretary of Agriculture.

The duty of exercising all the important powers listed in the bill is by its terms placed upon the Secretary of Agriculture; he is to find the facts; he is to formulate the regulations, and promulgate them, and in general he is to exercise discretionary powers of a very broad and important nature. As already stated, everybody knows that the circumstances are such as would prevent him from even giving direction to the affairs of the Food and Drug Administration.

As stated, the administration of the bill should have in mind the protection of the public and the interests of the great commerce involved in the three industries. Both of these functions belong to the Department of Commerce, in whose Secretary, it is suggested, control of the administration of this act should rest. It is noted that both of these objectives are within the scope of the Departments' activities, as shown by the Twenty-first Annual Report of the Secretary of Commerce for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1933, page IX.

"The chief service of the Department of Commerce, measured by the proportion of funds so devoted, is in the interest of public protection and safety. It has become customary to regard the Department as concerned almost exclusively with the promotion of trade. Most of its budget, however, is spent in protecting life and property. At least 65 percent of its available funds is devoted to the maintenance of lighthouses, marine and aeronautic inspection, to the prevention of mining disasters, to protection against dishonest weights and measures, and to the performance of other functions, the activities and responsibilities of which do not shrink with the general decrease of business. In times like the present keener competition for the reduced volume of business naturally results in curtailing expenditures, subjects the general standards and practices of business and transportation to unusual strain, and it is especially necessary that vigilance in the interest of public security be maintained."

It may be noted that since the close of the first 9 months of the year covered by the foregoing report, the activities of the Department of Commerce have been materially curtailed, and, in consequence, there is no reason why the direction of the administration of the proposed act could not have the personal attention of the Secretary.

We earnestly ask your careful consideration of the foregoing suggestions.

Respectfully submitted.

CHAIRMANSHIP OF REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the Week, at Columbus, Ohio, of the issue of Saturday, May 19, 1934, entitled "A Chairman Skillful in Organization, Entrenched in Confidence of Business Men, Wise in Party Needs, Is Demand of the Times."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Week, Columbus, Ohio, Saturday, May 19, 1934]

A CHAIRMAN SKILLFUL IN ORGANIZATION, ENTRENCHED IN CONFIDENCE OF BUSINESS MEN, WISE IN PARTY NEEDS, IS DEMAND OF THE TIMES

The coming meeting of the National Republican Committee scheduled for the city of Chicago, Ill., on June 5, 1934, is an occasion that should arouse the intense interest of every Republican voter in the Nation.

The decision, that it is contemplated will be made at this meeting, of choosing a successor to the retiring chairman, Mr. Everett Sanders, is a matter of profound importance, not only to the future of the Republican Party but to the future peace, happiness, and prosperity of the American people.

At this juncture in the affairs of the Nation when our economic and social existence is threatened, if not actually involved, with the prospect of dissolution, leadership in politically organized defense of the sacred inheritances guaranteed under the Constitution calls for those outstanding qualifications and traits of character which radiate courage, inspire confidence, elevate and dignify honesty of purpose in espousing a cause in the interests of the common weal.

Intensified and highly efficient organization ability, supported by the all-important powers of capable and judicious management, combine with the foregoing to provide ideal leadership. The decision, therefore, to be made at this meeting is second in importance to few, if any, which the party has been called upon to make since it came into existence.

Personal ambitions, friendships, or reward for services rendered must all be subordinated to the greater importance of organization and management through which only can success be achieved.

The situation is sufficiently precarious to justify extraordinary measures if need be. And before a decision is made the jury sitting in judgment should enrich its knowledge by a preliminary survey of exhaustive proportions. Should it appear that no one man was available who possessed all the qualifications required, but who did possess the necessary organizing ability, then it would appear that two men, whose combined qualifications would supply the required power, should be named. Success is paramount to all else.

The pressure imposed by a vivid realization of the advantage attached to an early decision should not be permitted to outweigh the more important element of capability. On the other hand, it does not appear that any necessity exists for deferring the choice of a new leader until after the November elections.

Temporizing would only serve to handicap rather than promote the program contemplated; hence, as soon as the man for the job is decided upon, his appointment should be immediately made. Nothing is to be gained by unnecessary delay, whereas much can be lost through the disadvantages that attach to the lack of organization when organized effort is essential to successful accomplishment.

Organization should be in the process of development now. The public mind is gradually awakening to the fallacies of government by theory and experiment, and there is much concern in Washington over the rising tide of criticism besetting the multitude of agencies comprising the new deal.

The failure of the administration, also, to impugn the integrity of former public officials through imperialistic modes of procedure has in no way added to their comfort. That the American people have not forsaken the traditional spirit of fair play is each day becoming more apparent.

The opportunism which contributed so largely to the favorable acceptance of the blatant theories advanced by the Democratic Party in 1932 is fast becoming recognized to have been a delusion.

Antidotes of Russian extraction, embodied in the alphabetical soup dished up by the administration, have failed to live up to the many virtues proclaimed for them, and the American people are beginning to see that it is time to call a halt. As a result the business world is in a state of chaos and bewilderment.

The underlying currents of thought are demanding a definition of purpose. From what has taken place, so far, there is little hope of any such assurance from the invisible government in power at the present time. "Planning" as used by the administration has proved to be a misnomer. A use of words that dignify the employment of practical methods, in arranging a definite series of steps for the attainment of a particular objective, has proven to be nothing more than proselyting in an effort to delude the people with reference to the risks involved in theories, speculation, and experiment.

Hence, in the absence of judicious leadership, we are left to ponder whether we are jumping from the frying pan of new dealism and restriction to the fire of regimentation and inquisition, through new laws about to be adopted by Congress. We are simply floundering in a maze of artificialities totally devoid of sense of direction or clarity of purpose.

This challenge to our civilization must be met in no uncertain way. A most auspicious occasion for the choosing of weapons is provided by the coming meeting of the National Republican Committee. It would seem that sufficient importance attaches to the occasion to justify the exercise of every reasonable precaution. The offices of a subcommittee, for the purpose of making a survey among the outstanding leaders in all walks of life, might afford a most valuable prelude to selective action. This would naturally involve a temporary delay of possibly 2 weeks, but better 2 weeks' delay than the prospect of 4 more years of apostate philosophy of government.

Delay is not always a manifestation of weakness. On the contrary, the very essence of strength lies in the virtues of investigation and research. However, Rome must not be permitted to burn while the modern Nero fiddles. Neither must the bogey of demagogues nor political opportunists serve to sway us from the line of duty.

To build constructively and securely we must provide a sound foundation upon which our superstructure is to rest. The designs for such an undertaking stand out upon the trestle board and the economic vision and political foresight of the master builder is much in demand to interpret properly and correlate their arrangement into a towering edifice of political supremacy, in the interests of a common cause.

The gauntlet has been thrown down in the nature of an abdicated Congress, whereby the illegitimate offsprings of mental degeneracy have been foisted upon business America until the future is altogether unassuring.

With each new shuffle in the new deal comes a corresponding new joker. We are unable to determine whether trumps of today will be trumps tomorrow. We are unable to determine whether our business shall suffer extinction by suffocation, under the arbitary rules of higher wages and shorter working hours, or tomorrow will find us in the arms of a legalized monopoly under the codes, or we may be cast adrift altogether to shift for ourselves.

The time has come, and the Republican Party must carry the flag, for a restoration of constituted government as defined by the Constitution of the United States of America. The American way, as evidenced by its 157 years of evolutionary progression, has achieved a world accomplishment.

We have already gone too far toward the Russian way, in experimentations that possess no lasting merit; and it is high time that patriotic Americans, who are interested in the future welfare of the Nation, join hands in the erection of a beacon light—the selection of a leader—whose guiding genius will steer us clear of the shoals of ignominious disaster.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 29.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and lays before the Senate the joint resolution.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be read for amendments, committee amendments to be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the joint resolution for amendment.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the joint resolution and read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the States, to wit:

"The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows: The choice of each State for President and Vice President shall be determined at a general election of the qualified electors of such State. The time of such election shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different time such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. The electors in each State shall vote directly for President and Vice President, and the laws of such State which apply to the canvassing of votes for chief executive of the State shall apply to the votes cast for President and Vice President. The laws of the State providing for the placing of the names of candidates for the office of chief executive of such State, including the names of independent candidates, upon the official ballot, if any is provided by the laws of the State, shall apply to the names of candidates, including independent candidates, for the office of President and Vice President. Each State shall be entitled to as many votes for President and Vice President as the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State is entitled in Congress. Each State shall certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, the result of said election. Such certificate shall contain distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President and for Vice President, the number of votes for each, and the total votes of the State cast for all candidates for President and for all candidates for Vice President. The President of the Senate shall, at a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to suggest an amendment, on page 3, line 8, after the word "votes", to insert the words "by States", so that it will read:

And the votes by States shall then be counted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall have no objection to that amendment; but under the unanimous-consent agreement, we are considering committee amendments first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair understand the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Nebraska did not ask, as the Chair understands, that committee amendments be considered first.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I did.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not so understand.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is agreed to.

The reading of the joint resolution was resumed.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 3, after line 8, to strike out:

The votes cast in any State for any candidate for President shall be disregarded if such votes are less than 1 percent of the total votes cast in such State for President. Each person for whom votes were cast for President in each State shall be credited with such proportion and fraction thereof of the Presidential votes of such States as he received of the total votes cast at said election for President, using for such fraction three decimals. The person having the greatest number of Presidential votes for President shall be President.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The person having the greatest number of votes cast for President in any State shall be credited with all the Presidential votes for President to which said State is entitled. The person having the greatest number of Presidential votes for President shall be the President, if such number is 35 percent or more of the total Presidential votes cast for President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 3, lines 22 and 23, I move to strike out the words "is 35 percent or more" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "be a majority."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 3, lines 22 and 23, to strike out the words "is 35 percent or more" and to insert in lieu thereof "be a majority", so as to make the sentence read:

The person having the greatest number of Presidential votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the total Presidential votes cast for President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as I understand the purpose of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Nebraska and adopted by the Senate is to substitute a majority for 35 percent?

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct. That is the only effect of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has become convinced it is better not to permit an election by popular vote of what may be termed a minority candidate?

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 4, line 4, in section 2, after the word "President", to insert "or if no person shall have received 35 percent of the total Presidential votes"; in line 6, to strike out "such persons" and insert "the persons having the highest numbers of Presidential votes not exceeding 3 on the list of those voted for as President", and in line 9, after the word "immediately" to insert the words "by ballot", so as to read:

If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of votes cast for President, or if no person shall have received 35 percent of the total Presidential votes, then from the persons having the highest numbers of Presidential votes not exceeding 3 on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately by ballot the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to submit, striking out section 2. It has been proposed to amend section 3 by two committee amendments. The amendment that is printed and on the desks of Senators provides for striking out on page 4, lines 3 to 17. That will include all of section 2. It is immaterial whether the committee amendments are agreed to or otherwise, but they will have to be disposed of first under the parliamentary situation, I presume.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the committee amendments to section 2 are rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I offer an amendment to strike out section 2, on page 4, lines 3 to 20.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, on page 4, section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of votes cast for President, then from such persons the House of Representatives shall choose immediately the President. In choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having 1 vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a majority of such quorum shall be necessary to a choice.

If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of such votes cast for Vice President, then from such persons the Senate shall choose the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. That completes the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that, this being a joint resolution involving an amendment to the Constitution, it requires a two-thirds vote to pass it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. Do pairs count on a question of this kind?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would require two pairs in the affirmative against one in the negative.

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. Were I permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FESS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am not advised how he would vote. Therefore, I must withdraw my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. METCALF. I understand that under the ruling of the Chair I am at liberty to vote. Therefore, I vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MCNARY. I submit the inquiry to justify the vote just cast by the Senator from Rhode Island. A number of Senators have general pairs. This being an amendment to the Constitution requiring a two-thirds vote, is a Senator having a single pair at liberty to vote on a question of this kind?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pairs of Senators are a matter of conscience with them. The Chair, as a parliamentarian, could not answer as to the technique of their consciences, as to whether or not they feel they should withhold their votes. Ordinarily, 2 affirmative votes are required for 1 negative vote in case of a general pair on a question requiring a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MCNARY. The question arises with me not so much as a matter of conscience as a matter of the rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no rule of the Senate concerning the matter. The Chair repeats that, in his opinion, it is a matter of conscience on the part of the various Senators concerning their pairs with their colleagues.

Mr. MCNARY. I feel quite indifferent about the matter; but the usual practice has been that pairs are assumed to cover legislative measures, and that when a constitutional question arises, pairs of two to one being required, the parties to a pair are absolved from it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be the ordinary construction of the Chair, though, as he repeats, some Senator might think he was obligated to his pair in his absence, and withhold his vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce the absence from the city of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DIETERICH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] on important official business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I have been advised that I am at liberty to vote. However, I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] and will let my vote stand. I am advised that the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea" if present.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on the same basis I feel that I am at liberty to vote, although I do not know how my pair would vote if present. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. HATFIELD. In keeping with the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and also in keeping with the explanation made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). In order that I may make a motion to reconsider, I change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I regret to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I desire further to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are detained at a conference at the White House.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are detained at an important committee meeting.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are necessarily absent. I am advised that the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay" if present.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] is detained from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is detained on official business. I am informed that if present he would vote "yea."

YEAS—42

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 42, the nays are 24. Two thirds of the Senators present not having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is rejected.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, at 3 o'clock p.m., the Senate proceed to vote without further debate upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate Joint Resolution 29 was rejected, and that if the vote shall be reconsidered the Senate shall then vote without further debate upon the passage of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the Chair). Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think one or two Members on this side of the aisle opposed the joint resolution when it was brought up a few days ago. They are not present. Personally, I have no objection to the request; but in the absence of Members of the Senate who opposed the joint resolution, I should not want to give unanimous consent to proceed to vote again on it without further debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say to the Senator that I have no desire myself to have that done. I include that in the request only because I realize that Senators in charge of the unfinished business do not want delay, and I have assumed that no one wants to debate the question further, because it has been debated. I can, of course, make the motion at any time within 3 days without unanimous consent. I simply submitted the request for unanimous consent in my desire not to interfere with the consideration of the unfinished business any more than necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, my understanding is that the Senator from Nebraska has requested that at 3 o'clock tomorrow the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed at once to vote on a motion to reconsider, and, if that motion shall prevail, to vote without further debate on the joint resolution itself.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that perfectly. The Senator has made a very full and complete explanation. I quite appreciate what the Senator desires. Only a few Members of the Senate are present, however; and I cannot consent to a vote on reconsideration and on the joint resolution itself without debate in view of the possibility that some Senator may wish to debate it. I suggest that the Senator renew his request tomorrow, when there will be a larger attendance of Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will submit another request for unanimous consent. Several Senators have said that they are not familiar with the joint resolution in its amended form. I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 29, as amended, and as we voted upon its final passage, be printed in bill form, and be printed in the RECORD so that Senators may be apprised of its exact form.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is quite proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it so ordered.

The joint resolution as amended is as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the States, to wit:

"The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America: He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows: The choice of each State for President and Vice President shall be determined at a general election of the qualified electors of such State. The time of such election shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different time such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. The electors in each State shall vote directly for President and Vice President, and the laws of such State which apply to the canvassing of votes for chief executive of the State shall apply to the votes cast for President and Vice President. The laws of the State providing for the placing of the names of candidates for the office of chief executive of such State, including the names of independent candidates, upon the official ballot, if any is provided by the laws of the State, shall apply to the names of candidates, including independent candidates for the office of President and Vice President. Each State shall be entitled to as many votes for President and Vice President as the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State is entitled in Congress. Each State shall certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, the result of said election. Such certificate shall contain distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President and for Vice President, the number of votes for each, and the total votes of the State cast for all candidates for President and for all condidates for Vice President. The President of the Senate shall, at a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes by States shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes cast for President in any State shall be credited with all the Presidential votes for President to which said State is entitled. The person having the greatest number of Presidential votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the total Presidential votes cast for President. The foregoing provisions shall apply to the election of Vice President, but no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President.

"SEC. 2. If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of votes for President, then the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, one of them for President. If two or more persons do not have an equal and the highest number of votes for President, and if no person have a majority of such votes, then from the persons having the three highest numbers of such votes the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having 1 vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

"If no person has a majority of the votes for Vice President, then from the persons having the two highest numbers of such votes the Senate shall choose the Vice President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 3. Congress may by law provide what procedure shall be followed and the method of obtaining a decision in case there shall be more than one certificate of Presidential votes from any State, or in case of any other dispute or controversy that may arise in the counting and the canvassing of the Presidential votes by said joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives.

"SEC. 4. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II of the Constitution, and the twelfth amendment to the Constitution are hereby repealed."

Mr. NORRIS. I now move to reconsider the vote by which Senate Joint Resolution 29 was rejected, and give notice that I shall call up the motion at 3 o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had concurred in Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 17, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3355) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, to correct an error therein.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2845) to extend the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act to other stolen property, and it was signed by the Vice President.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. FESS obtained the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not want to lose my rights. When the Senate took a recess on Friday, I had the floor, and yielded to other Senators. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Ohio shall take my place and make his speech, but I do not want to lose my right to complete my speech.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent that a Senator cannot retain the floor under the circumstances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator cannot retain the floor. The Senate has transacted business since last Friday concerning the joint resolution just disposed of, and undoubtedly no Senator has a preferential right to recognition.

Mr. LONG. I do not think we ought to be quite so technical as that. I yielded on Friday in order that the Senate might take a recess.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has a right to resume the floor. There is no question about that.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, last Friday I had occasion to make some remarks on the history of the much-disputed tariff question, and stated at the time that at a later date I should claim the floor to discuss the pending measure. That is my purpose in rising to address the Senate.

The trying and protracted period of a world-wide economic depression may be compared with an epidemic that ravages mankind throughout a large portion of the world. At first there are various speculations as to the cause of the trouble and the best methods of effecting a cure. As the disease grows in momentum and magnitude, hope gives way to panic, and established and approved methods are abandoned for hastily conceived nostrums and cure-alls. The country becomes a laboratory of experimentation, and despair prompts us to grasp at any new remedy that promises some degree of relief. Whatever may be claimed as justification for reliance upon experiments and panaceas during a crisis, these should cease when the emergency passes. Important as is a return of economic recovery, desirable as is immediate return of prosperity, vastly more important and desirable is the maintenance of our Constitution and the institutions developed under it.

Crises are not new and not confined to our own country. In our past they have been more or less periodic and due to disturbances of economic forces in which speculation has played a part, and at times legislation has been the occasion. The remedy lies in the correction of faulty legislation where that is the cause and to resumption of normal processes where speculation is the cause. The crisis of 1817 was an inevitable result of the speculation that followed the War of 1812. That of 1837 resulted from the speculative movement in western land purchases. That of 1857 was largely due to the Walker tariff of 1846, only deferred by foreign demands for our goods in China and the countries engaged in the Crimean War. That of 1893 was likewise largely due to tariff tinkering, as was the case of that of 1913, only to be relieved by the World War.

In all of these cases the sound remedy was followed—the resumption of the normal processes of economic law to relieve results of the violation of the forces of the laws of economic growth. True, in every case there were theoretical reformers urging various nostrums as cure-alls, but not until 1933–34 was there any yielding by the Congress to any such nostrums.

The depressing effects of the present crisis reached us in 1929, although the economic disturbance had affected Europe the year before. It resulted from a world-wide convulsion in the play of economic forces to win the war, resulting in the death of 15,000,000 of the world's best, when 25,000,000 more seriously, if not, totally disabled; in the devastation and destruction of hundreds of billions of dollars of property, and in the mortgaging for the future of much of the world's existing property, heavily debt burdened. The major cause of the all-embracing economic break-down is found in the all but complete abandonment of all sound principles of business and government, which will not and cannot be relieved by further violation of the laws of a sound economy such as has been inaugurated, the failure of which we all recognize, if we do not admit. As in the past, and as in the present as viewed in other countries, notably the British Empire, if not the quickest, the surest method is to permit the normal laws of trade to operate, free from the deadening uncertainty of experimentation with the laws of economic progress. Had the foibles of the new deal been avoided and the operation of normal processes of trade been permitted to continue as they were operating in the last half of the year 1932, we would doubtless have been today far in the lead of Great Britain's substantial comeback, reached without resort to fantastic theories foisted upon us in the program of experimentation. Even as it is, in spite of these artificial stimuli, some gains are to be noted.

There is accumulating evidence throughout the world that the depression has run its course, and that the crisis will pass if interferences with normal processes are but removed. Responsibility for the amelioration of human suffering and distress has not ceased, and will continue in greater or less degree until that distant time we call the millennium shall come.

There has never been a time when the relief of human distress and of human want has not engaged the thoughtful and earnest endeavor of civilized nations.

There have been notable instances of individual effort, of associated activities of public-spirited groups and organizations, and of national and governmental assistance. Individual and organized beneficences are primarily a local function, and doubtless government participation in relief activities where local resources are exhausted must continue throughout our day and through generations yet unborn. "The poor ye have always with you"; and the poor and suffering must always be a fundamental concern of individuals and of organized society. But this does not mean that a program devised in times of panic and despair to cover an emergency period must necessarily be applied as a permanent policy, even though the patient is on the road to recovery. It does not mean that economic experiments initiated in times of panic should be continued when and if the crisis is passing, or that emergency should be continued to be cited as an excuse merely for economic or fiscal experimentation. Emergency must not be allowed to become the vehicle on which revolutionary or unconstitutional measures are to become permanent policies.

That the world, especially beyond our borders, is recovering from the economic distemper that has afflicted it for 4 years or more, is daily becoming more evident. The nations making the greatest progress are those least affected by artificial remedies. Reliance upon emergency measures and economic and fiscal experiments as shown in these countries in contrast with our own is a hindrance rather than a help. Such nostrums can no longer have the excuse of necessity or of expediency. As might have been expected when recovery is viewed as a world situation the improvement has been first apparent and has proceeded further in the countries which were first to feel the effects of the depression and unhindered by artificial stimuli. Economic and industrial improvement is shown in figures of industrial production compiled by the statistical section of the League of Nations for the following countries: Japan, United Kingdom, Canada, Belgium, France, and Germany.

Taking the indexes of industrial production as compiled by these countries and reduced by the League of Nations to a common base by which the average production of 1928 is taken as 100, the index of Japan, at the end of 1933, had advanced 39 percent above the level of 1928. The indexes of the other countries were still below the 1928 level, but the percentages which they had regained of their extreme losses below the level of 1928 were, for the United Kingdom, 92 percent; for Canada, 43 percent; for Belgium, 42 percent; for France, 40 percent; and for Germany, 35 percent. Compared with these figures, the percentage of recovery for the United States, according to the Cleveland Trust Co. Business Bulletin, April 15, 1934, is 32 percent. It is true that we cannot tell how much of this increase is due to Government expenditure, which is more properly for relief than for recovery. Obviously it must be a large percentage.

It will be noted that this larger degree of recovery up to the end of 1933 in the countries mentioned—Japan, United Kingdom, Canada, Belgium, France, and Germany—than in the United States for the same period, has been brought about without resort to the experimental or emergency legislation which has been put into effect in this country. It would appear, therefore, that what we need at this time in America, instead of resorting to the laboratory of experimentation, is a calm appraisal of national and international conditions and an abandonment of the prevalent practice of citing an emergency as the reason for unprecedented experiments in legislation as is here proposed, as the sine qua non of economic recovery.

It is this economic emergency which is given as the reason for each and every item of the program of the new deal and is now being urged as the ground for the passage of the pending measure, H.R. 8687, to delegate to the President the power to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements. In section 350 (a) of the pending bill it is described "as a means of assisting in the present emergency, in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment, and the present economic depression."

In his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on March 8, 1934, the Secretary of State cited the existing great emergency as the reason for requesting this extraordinary grant of power to the executive branch of the Government.

I wish here and now to say that, while I cannot agree with the Secretary on his tariff views, all who know him will freely concede to him great respect for his consistency of views. He is one of the few outstanding American statesmen who still resist the protective tariff theory, and consistently plead for the principle of limiting tariff duties to revenue purposes.

HULL AMENDMENT TO TARIFF LAW

When we were discussing the act to amend the tariff law of 1930, Secretary Hull, then Senator, offered the following amendment:

> The Government of the United States agrees not to increase its protective tariffs above the present level for a period of 2 years, or to create new barriers or impediments to trade, provided other nations shall agree to pursue a like policy.

When before the committee on the pending proposal, and after referring to the fact that "we have seen in every part of the world despotism, dictatorships, and autocracies spring up overnight", the Secretary of State said:

> My observation after rather careful investigation has been that the mainspring of the moving influence of those revolutions has been people out of work, people who have become hungry, without enough clothes, without enough shelter, and other people have been hurled headlong into bankruptcy and are mad at everybody and everything, including their own institutions of government. We are not going to fall into that soon, but you could easily become victims of those things in other parts of the world, and for that reason I would invoke your attention long enough to deal with this emergency situation, the acuteness of which I cannot overemphasize. (P. 17, Ways and Means Committee Hearings.)

Again, the Secretary of State said in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, and other spokesmen of the administration said substantially the same thing:

> It is manifest that unless the Executive is given authority to deal with the existing great emergency somewhat on a parity with that exercised by the executive departments of so many other governments for purposes of negotiating and carrying into effect trade agreements, it will not be practicable or possible for the United States to pursue with any degree of success the proposed policy of restoring our lost international trade.

Mr. President, I wonder whether the words of the Secretary of State are properly understood when he makes the statement—

> It is manifest that unless the Executive is given authority to deal with the existing great emergency somewhat on a parity with that exercised by the executive departments of so many other governments * * * it will not be practicable or possible for the United States to pursue with any degree of success the proposed policy of restoring our lost international trade.

In appraising this statement it should not be overlooked that over 300,000,000 people of Europe and Asia, constituting the populations of many of the countries with which we are to bargain, are today under dictators. To give the President of the United States commensurate power with such dictators for bargaining is proposing an abandonment of American ideals never before suggested in high circles.

At the hearing held by the Finance Committee on April 26 the Secretary of State said:

> We are now faced with a panic and extraordinary measures are needed to meet the emergency. This is an emergency measure.

While it is admitted that we have unemployment today in our cities in large proportions but slightly relieved beyond Government stimulation, an examination of the recovery of other parts of the world would argue against, rather than for, such radical departures as here proposed.

The proposition before us, as stated by the spokesman of the administration, can be summed up in these words: That an emergency exists; and that the President must be given authority somewhat on a parity with that exercised by the executive departments of so many foreign governments for the purpose of negotiating trade agreements, in order that we may restore our foreign trade.

That the world has been engulfed in a great depression is known to all men. That signs are multiplying that the world is recovering from the depression is apparent to students of world affairs and observers of world conditions. In some aspects the emergency in our own country seems to be passing. To deny that we are emerging from the emergency is to deny the efficacy of the recovery program of the President which Senators on the other side of the aisle pressed so earnestly for adoption, and which many on this side supported in order that those having the responsibility of leadership in the crisis might have authority to act. If, in accordance with the contention of the Democrats, their policy is effective, it becomes the duty and the obligation of the legislative branch of the Government to scrutinize with greater care the remedies proposed by the Chief Executive and his advisers.

No one disputes the statement of the Chairman of the Finance Committee in presenting the bill to the Senate that the commerce of the world has materially declined, especially since 1929; and it is equally true that domestic trade has declined. In fact, the relative decline in domestic trade has been greater than the decline in foreign trade. Let Senators not forget that improvement in domestic business is the surest and soundest method of obtaining improvement in our foreign trade. Advancement of foreign trade as against domestic trade is a positive injury to our people. On the other hand, a prosperous domestic trade is the first essential of a prosperous foreign trade. To state it differently, a prosperous America would be our greatest possible contribution to the prosperity of the world. This should be our first and foremost concern in all our legislation, both of an emergent and permanent character, the opposite of which, when viewed from results, is emphasized in the pending bargaining-tariff proposal.

If we will but give domestic business a chance, we shall be definitely setting our faces toward recovery and the return of more prosperous times. Since 1928 in the outside world, and 1930 in our own country, production has been greatly interrupted. It is now showing a normal and world-wide advance toward improved conditions. It should not be further interrupted by hazardous and unwise experiments, and we should definitely avoid using the occasion for embarking on dangerous and unconstitutional proposals. It is the belief of the best thought of America that all basic elements of the country—agriculture, manufacturing, transportation, banking resources, mining, managerial ability, and skilled labor—now temporarily interrupted, will emerge if given a chance free from governmental interference.

Authorities on trade movements inform us that due to slowing up of production our inventories are low, that we now have greater shortages of goods and construction that our people need and want and greater accumulations of money and credit seeking employment than have ever existed before in this or any other country.

Mr. President, the significance of those facts must not be overlooked. With low inventories of goods, the people want and need, due to a slowing down for 4 years, and with the largest accumulation in history of money and credit idle and willing to work, nothing is necessary for resumption of business except confidence, which never can come except through the removal of the uncertainty which is brought about by this program of experimentation.

Improvement will be insured if we will but remove the obstacle of uncertainty involved in a program of artificial nostrums. The removal of uncertainty is the most important determinant of revival of business to absorb unemployment.

I cite as an example a recent statement of the Cleveland Trust Co., which is recognized as an authority because of the careful analyses it makes of economic currents:

> The index of industrial production of this bank was 29 percent below normal in January, 26.3 in February, 23.6 in March, and the April estimate is 21.7.

Showing a gradual improvement in the industrial situation as reflected by the analysis of that bank:

> Further improvement seems indicated for May. April increases were largest in iron and steel, textiles, lumber, automobiles, and coal.

All of those are basic commodities.

The Department of Labor estimates that manufactures have absorbed two and three quarters millions of workers more than a year ago, and that there has been an increase of $79,000,000 in weekly wages. General Johnson puts the figure at 3,000,000 reemployed through the operation of the National Recovery Administration. Of course, these wage increases are in reality a restoration of actual wage cuts incidental to the new monetary policy, and must be interpreted in the light of currency revaluation reducing the dollar to 59 cents, which tended to reduce the purchasing power of the previous wage scale. Under more normal and less artificial and arbitrary methods of recovery, gains might have been and most certainly would have been less nominal and more real.

Bank clearings are offered as another criterion of domestic improvement. They recorded on April 21 of the present year the largest weekly total since January 1932. After allowing for technical differences in the periods compared, bank clearings this year reflect some gains in business over last year. Many cities reported larger clearings than a year ago, an increase being noted in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and some other western and southern points. To what extent this showing is due to Government stimulation by public expenditures is difficult to analyze. What proportion is relief and what recovery is, of course, quite important but difficult to determine.

Production of durable goods, the key log to the jam, has not been satisfactory, but has shown some increase. Production of nondurable goods has increased slightly more than seasonally in March and the first half of April 1934, according to the monthly report of the Conference of Statisticians in Industry of the National Industrial Conference Board. Whether there is any substantial improvement beyond Government stimulation is still a question. Notable gains were reported, especially in the automobile industry; some gains in building and engineering construction, which would be reflected in gains in steel and iron; bituminous coal mining; electric power production; and textile apparel manufacturing. What percent, if any, of this increase is normal and what is artificial stimulus has not as yet been analyzed. It is the belief of management that it would have been greater if permitted to pursue normal processes free from the uncertainty of experimentation. Some gains are also noted in the production of passenger cars and trucks; and exports of motor vehicles substantially increased in February over a year ago.

Statistics appearing during the week of April 21 indicated a rising business tendency, according to Moody's index figures, for freight-car loadings, electric-power production, and steel-ingot output. It is believed that, given a chance, with greater certainty in the future, less experimentation, and less governmental interference, we will see, as in England and Canada, a substantial turn toward recovery.

Mr. President, it should be noted that in the last 2 weeks, from the index figures of same agencies, there has been something of a recession instead of an increase. It is, however, rather difficult to analyze.

The future analyst in dealing with this period of the new deal will point to the economic adventures as attempted artificial stimuli on behalf of reforms involving serious economic consequences.

He will not only emphasize the danger of such artificial nostrums as relief, but will also direct attention to penalizing legislation, written on the impulse of the moment, which ultimately must result not only in disappointment but in disaster, so well illustrated by what we have been passing through since the 4th of March 1933, in the form not only of deficits, and increased taxes to meet them, but many other radical suggestions. No thoughtful student can view the recent trend in taxation without concern.

That principle of taxation which applies the burden according to ability to pay is sound within limits. When it reaches the point of penalizing the taxpayer, it will defeat itself as a revenue source and result in an actual loss. This is demonstrated by experience in the history of taxation. It is the principle known in political economy as "diminishing returns." In the field of customs duties it is well demonstrated. Rates up to a given scale insure increased revenue; beyond that scale they mean a decrease of revenue. A rate of taxation which discourages enterprise will reduce the revenue. That is why a balanced Budget, not by increasing taxes but by reducing Government expenses, is essential. If it must depend upon constant increase of the tax burden, it will defeat itself. All Government obligations must in the final analysis be met by this source, unless repudiation is resorted to, which makes a growing deficit a continuous obstacle against business revival.

The outlook for the payment of taxes is not brightened by a program of Government competition with industry on the one hand and penalizing legislation on the other. Unless there is some assurance that the profits of industry are not to be totally absorbed by tax demands, there will be no enlargement of an existing industry nor the development of a new industry. The contention from high circles for a redistribution of wealth through the form of taxation is a deterrent to recovery. The demand from like sources for the elimination of the element of profit from investment on behalf of business as a philanthropy is a further deterrent. Investment at best is a risk fraught with grave concern. If the Government policy dictates the elimination of profit on behalf of philanthropy, then it must guarantee against loss, else business is wiped out and revenue lost.

It is obvious that the investor who is under Government compulsion through exacting taxation to conduct his business on altruistic lines by eliminating the element of profit will decline to make the effort. The constant threat on the part of certain influential factors of the administration that if the manager declines to embrace the expensive plans of the new deal, which demand additional taxes, his business will be taken over and run by the Government, compels him to stop, look, and listen.

This cumulation of adverse forces antagonistic to a revival of business is one of the greatest obstacles against normal recovery through which enterprise must employ labor, and the Government may be compelled to continue its ominous program inaugurated on Government expenditure, already resulting in a shocking state in the Treasury, which, if not halted, will make the Government the chief employer of labor, with all the frightful consequences involved in political management of industry.

This situation accounts for the rumor that a number of men with large incomes have recently said that rather than see their earnings swallowed up by the Government in taxes, they would take things easy. The danger of this statement arises from the fact that it is not so much a matter of choice as compulsion. While the rumor will be criticized by the element which is throttling the thrifty and punishing the frugal and industrious in a desire to soak the rich, the country is less interested in a criticism of a practice than it is in actual results compelled by Government policies, as inevitable results are much more important to the public than mere individual criticism of the conduct of the taxpayer. These are some of the obstacles in the way of normal recovery, which, if removed, would open the way. Yet in the face of these obstructions the strength of American industry is sufficient to show some gains in meeting demands.

In a not distant future the years 1933 and 1934 will be singled out as the years when an American administration actually ordered millions of hogs slaughtered, and meat destroyed, when 10,000,000 men were out of work and in needy circumstances. This period will be marked as the time when the Government paid farmers $10 per acre for leaving their wheat ground lie fallow, a similar sum if they would plow up their cotton, notwithstanding the millions of citizens seeking in vain employment, and actually suffering by underconsumption of these very necessaries of life. These are some of the economic blunders of the program of national planning which make business revival very difficult.

The power to revive is further shown in our foreign trade. The foreign commerce division of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States reports that—

> The year 1933 was a turning point in our foreign commerce. The steady decline in both our export and import trade was definitely checked in the middle of the year, and was replaced during the last half of the year by a substantial recovery movement. This paralleled in part the improvement in domestic trade and the change in economic conditions in many major sections of the world.

In the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee by the administration advocates of conferring this extraordinary tariff power upon the President, and repeated by the chairman in opening the debate on the floor of the Senate, much stress was laid upon the decline of our foreign trade from 1929 to 1932. But in these arguments the decline in imports and exports was stated in terms of value, and not in terms of volume. The decline in value makes an impressive showing, amounting to something like 69 percent in 1932 compared with 1929; a decline that is largely due, however, to the enormous fall in commodity prices.

But when the decline is expressed in terms of volume instead of value the picture is not such a gloomy one. In volume the decline in our imports and exports amounted to about 30 percent, about the same as the decline on some branches of domestic production and far less than the decline in the steel and construction industries. In these arguments, however, the comparison of the statistics of foreign trade have generally been based upon the figures for 1929 and 1932. The year 1929 was a boom year, a year of abnormally large exports and imports, and the year 1932 followed the collapse of central Europe, a low year of the depression. The comparison is misleading because it is based on inflated prices in 1929 and deflated prices in 1932.

A comparison of 1929 and 1933 would not make quite such a bad showing. Imports in 1932 were $1,323,000,000; in 1933 they were $1,449,000,000. Our exports in 1932 were $1,577,000,000; in 1933 they were $1,647,000,000. Here was an increase of $126,000,000, or 9.6 percent, in imports in 1933 over 1932; and an increase in our exports of $70,000,000, a 4-percent increase over 1932. When it is noted that our exports for the first 5 months of 1933 were lower by 24 percent than they were in the first 5 months of 1932, the net gain of 4 percent for the full 12 months of 1933 over 1932 is more significant. Suspension of production covering the usual period of depression will give way to increased business activity due to low inventories as is shown by statistics. Our foreign, as our domestic, commerce awaits the chance for normal processes, not artificial nostrums, and certainly not unconstitutional proposals, such as delegating the taxing power to the Executive.

The increase of exports and imports took place without the exercise by the President of any tariff-bargaining powers and in spite of the program of experimentation. It is reasonable to suppose that foreign trade will gradually improve as business conditions improve both here and abroad and world prices approach a more nearly normal level. A plan to stabilize currencies and restore world prices would have a better and more far-reaching effect upon world trade than Presidential bargain hunting. Our domestic trade is twice as large as the trade of the rest of the world.

Mr. President, not to detain the Senate unduly, I should like to have permission to insert in the RECORD, without reading, a table which gives the total exports and imports by months for the years 1932 and 1933.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, no other nation has the domestic purchasing and consuming power that we have. Here in the United States—I scarcely need repeat what is known by our people—we have a market for over 90 percent of our production. We are dependent upon foreign markets for less than 10 percent of our consumption, while foreign countries, in contrast, depend upon exports for an outlet for from 20 to 80 percent of their products. There certainly is no prospect for us to increase the export of such goods as are now produced in other countries far in excess of their domestic requirements. I need go no further by way of illustration than to refer to our experience in the case of wheat. At one time we found a market in Europe for all our surplus wheat. Today that market is gone, not because the people are not consuming wheat, but because they are getting it from countries which are now producing it which did not produce wheat prior to the World War.

With the exception of cotton, certain types of machinery, some electrical appliances, typewriters, adding machines, and automobiles, the demand for many of our products which were formerly exported in large quantities has declined because of increased production in countries that can sell these products at prices lower than our cost of production.

The export demand for American cattle and wheat has declined sharply because of increased production in Canada, Argentina, Australia, and Russia. Intensive effort has been directed since the World War toward increased production of both agricultural and manufactured products. Almost every country has made some effort to become more self-contained and less dependent upon other countries.

This economic situation is one of the contributions of the World War which was called into existence first as an emergency and has now become permanent. It has definitely absorbed the foreign market by supplying it with cheaper production, never to be regained by us with our more expensive products due to higher standards of living.

That is one reason for the decline in world trade; and so long as this tendency continues we shall find it difficult to obtain larger foreign markets through international agreements by tariff bargaining, except upon such terms that we shall have far more to lose than to gain.

The advocates of extending this unprecedented tariff power to the President have not told us with any definiteness where greater foreign markets are to be found or what of our commodities may benefit, and they have been equally indefinite about what domestic products are to be sacrificed in order that our exports may be increased. There have been some intimations from the Secretary of Agriculture that some unspecified small and inefficient industries may be wiped out and their products imported from more efficient foreign countries, his test of efficiency apparently being cheapness of price. It would be interesting to the American people to be told by authority just what articles of American production are to be included in the list of those which are inefficient and expensive. In all probability the American people will deny both intimations—that their industries are inefficient, or that they are expensive.

The Secretary also intimated that if we bought more sugar from Cuba, Cuba might buy more lard from us. Such a prospect might appeal to the Corn Belt, but it would be far from satisfactory to Louisiana and the beet-sugar States.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to suggest that the best corn section of Iowa is also the sugar-beet-producing section of Iowa. Therefore, if we were to buy more sugar from Cuba in order to sell more lard, we should be cutting off the sugar-beet area of Iowa. On top of that, the best corn area of Iowa is also the best hog area of Iowa. Therefore, we have three conflicting interests there, none of which can be segregated according to any international trade agreement with any country in the world without punishing some particular industry.

Mr. FESS. I appreciate the statement of the Senator from Iowa, who conclusively refutes the statement of another citizen of Iowa from whom I was quoting. That is why I used the expression that the action that is proposed might be favorable to the hog area or the corn area. I had not attempted to analyze it, but I admit the strength of the statement of the Senator.

Mr. President, if Secretary Wallace's definition of efficiency—that is, cheapness—should be applied to all our products, Japan would supply our pottery; France, our silk, laces, and wines; England, our cotton and worsted goods; Germany and Belgium, our steel products; Switzerland, our cheese and watches; Argentina, our wheat, flaxseed, and meat; and New Zealand, our butter. Under any such impracticable program, new alphabetical bureaucracies would have to be speedily established to care for the unemployed and feed the hungry, and "recovery" would be a word to be mentioned only in our prayers. Of course, no administration should be permitted to carry out any such program as that.

Nevertheless, implied and involved in this tariff-bargaining plan is some thought or idea of applying such a theory in part, at least. The program is definitely described as being a give-and-take arrangement. What is there that we could take in a foreign market that would compensate us for what we would have to give of our domestic market? Let the items be specified.

There are many cities in the United States whose trade is worth more to us than the entire commerce of some foreign countries. Our domestic market is so much more important to us than any possible foreign market that it should be maintained and safeguarded in spite of the alluring but deceptive promises of reciprocal trades. We have only the friendliest feeling for foreign countries and for their people; we wish them peace, prosperity, and continued development; but our altruistic sentiments do not include the folly of destroying our own business, or any part of it, to promote at our expense the business of foreign competing countries.

We were assured that there would be no lowering of the tariff on agricultural products. That assurance came from the very highest authority, the President of the United States, while a candidate; and the assurance has been constantly repeated by those identified with the administration.

Mr. President, if we could always match promise with performance, it would not be serious; but, unfortunately, promises made in a campaign may not, at the time they are made, be fully comprehended by the one making them. Consequently, it is a common thing for the most solemn promise to be broken, or, I may say, respected only in the breach rather than in the observance.

In a speech on July 30 at Albany, N.Y., Governor Roosevelt, now President Roosevelt, said:

> Let us have courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits. Stop the deficits. Let us have equal courage to reverse the policy of the Republican leaders and insist on a sound currency. * * * This concerns you, my friends, who have managed to lay aside a few dollars for a rainy day.

That statement was made by the same person who on the 10th of March 1933 announced that for 3 long years we had been on the road to ruin, and said that we were facing a startling deficit of $1,200,000,000 for that year. Hardly 6 months had elapsed—in fact, only 4 months—when a message came to us stating that the deficit, instead of being $1,200,000,000, would be six times that; and yet the order was to "stop these deficits."

On October 4 Mr. Hoover was making an address in Des Moines, Iowa. He made rather a startling statement in reference to the country having narrowly escaped going off the gold standard. That statement was offensive to many of our Democratic leaders, including the very distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARRAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I suppose the Senator could quote Mr. Hoover as our Democratic tariff authority now. That ought to be good news. Whatever the Senator might quote would be good Democratic tariff philosophy at this time.

Mr. FESS. My friend from Louisiana is so facile in his illustrations that I am afraid to approve or disapprove his statement. I am not sure just what he means. Of course, I know he makes that statement in good humor, as I take it in good humor.

Mr. LONG. I was just comparing what President Hoover had said with what President Roosevelt had said. President Hoover had said that he wanted to have the tariff-making authority turned over to him under the flexible-tariff law, and President Roosevelt had spoken of it in effect as being anarchistic and unconstitutional.

Now we have flopped back and have adopted Mr. Hoover's policy, I guess, or that of somebody else—I do not know who it is. I have never found out where President Roosevent comes in on this thing. Either he is disowned here or he has quit the company. I do not know just where we stand on this matter. I am going to send out a questionnaire and find where I stand with the party.

Mr. FESS. I should be interested in that.

I interpret the reference of the Senator from Louisiana to mean that those of us who supported the flexible-tariff provision as approved by President Hoover are inconsistent now because we refuse to go as far as the pending bill proposes to go. I discussed that question last week. I said that I approached the flexible-tariff provisions with a good deal of reluctance. When it was first suggested, it was offensive to me; but the logrolling practice which always obtains in the legislative branch when there are two or three thousand tariff items to consider, all at one time, offered so many opportunities for error that I felt, if we could enter upon a scientific method by which a survey would be made, the data assembled, and a body of facts presented upon which the President might act, not upon a whole schedule but upon an individual item, the innovation would be justified; and for that reason, with some reluctance, I supported it. Of course, however, I never dreamed of going to the extent of permitting the President, without a hearing or the collection of data, just upon his own ipse dixit, to say what a tariff rate should be. That would be exceedingly offensive, to my way of thinking on tariff legislation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there not the further very important distinction that under the existing flexibility there is a specific yardstick—to wit, the cost of production—whereas under this proposed new arrangement we are embarking upon the uncertain sea of personal judgment, which may be unrelated to cost of production; indeed, which we are notified will be primarily related to a tryrannical decision as to what business is entitled to survive in the United States? I do not know how a dfference could be more fundamental than that.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is correct. He gives an illustration very apt and commanding.

There is another danger which I should like to have my colleagues realize. If power shall be given to the President to say what this rate shall be or what that rate shall be, an industry which is now protected might be forced into a controversy with the highest authority on some rule under the N.R.A. which might involve serious consequences. What is to deter the President from saying, "Meet this requirement, or you will be destroyed"? The President would not say that, but why should we give such power to any man that under impulse he might be led to do such a thing? That is a consequence which would be possible under the provision written into this authority, of which heretofore nobody ever dreamed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator certainly is justified in his observation. I call his attention to the fact, by way of further confirmation, that it is a fundamental theory in the philosophy of fascism that a dictatorship of that character can only succeed as it has its hand upon the economic power to rule or ruin industry. Therefore this proposal is Fascist in its philosophy, Fascist in its objective, and might well become Fascist in its operation.

Mr. FESS. Certainly that is true, and, as has been said so often, the danger is not how far the step, it is the direction in which the step is taken. It is not the number of steps taken, but rather whether the first step is to be taken. When the first step shall have been taken, everybody knows what will follow.

Mr. President, I recall that less than 20 years ago, when I was a Member of the other body, there was a destructive fire in a city in a certain State, and an appeal came from that State to the House of Representatives for relief from the Government. The appeal developed a very serious debate, and even a Member of the House from the State which was to be benefited spoke against the relief being given, on the ground that if we embarked on that policy we would never stop.

As I have stated, that was less than 20 years ago.

There was recently a drought in the West, and I am told that it is being estimated that the loss will amount to somewhere between five and six hundred million dollars. No doubt we shall be asked, before we adjourn, to give authority for the appropriation of an enormous amount of money for relief, and we shall be justified in taking that action, because we have started upon the policy, the first step of which was difficult to take, but it has now become the practice of the Government, and we pursue the course easily. That is the significance of any innovation, especially if there is a test of constitutional authority in making it.

Mr. President, I was about to quote what President Hoover said about our near approach to going off the gold standard. His statement somewhat aroused our Democratic brethren, and an ex-Secretary of the Treasury, now a very distinguished Member of this body, who wrote the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, and who was called upon to reply to the statement which had been made by President Hoover. Let me read a brief statement made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who had been Secretary of the Treasury in President Wilson's Cabinet, and who wrote the plank in the Democratic platform announcing the party's position in favor of a sound currency. This is what the Senator said:

> I assert that those of us responsible for legislation never had the remotest intimation from the administration that the gold standard was in danger. I repeat the assertion that anybody who now says anything to the contrary of what is alleged here is either ignorant of the facts or indifferent to the truth.

The Senator further commented upon the statement:

> If the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had knowledge of the fact that this country was faced with imminent disaster by being driven off the gold standard in 2 weeks, and failed to so advise the banks and private investors who purchased nearly $4,000,000,000 of these Federal securities, they were guilty of amazing dishonesty; they were cheating the investment public; and could not even appropriate to themselves the solace of future oblivion.

That was the statement of the senior Senator from Virginia in answering President Hoover's allegation that we were within 2 weeks of going off the gold standard.

The Democratic candidate for President at that time, now the distinguished President of the United States, made this statement:

> The business men of this country, battling hard to maintain their financial solvency and integrity, were told in blunt language in Des Moines, Iowa, how close an escape the country had some months ago from going off the gold standard. This, as has been clearly shown since, was a libel on the credit of the United States.

The distinguished speaker proceeded:

> No adequate answer has been made to the magnificent philippic of Senator Glass, in which he showed how unsound was this assertion. And I might add Senator Glass made a devastating—

I wish this language to be especially noted—

> Senator Glass made a devastating challenge that no responsible government would have sold to the country securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise, yes, the covenant, embodied in these securities, was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was.

Mr. President, I am mentioning this to indicate the danger of relying upon promises made during the time of a campaign. I have just finished quoting a statement from the President. What followed? First, gold payments were suspended. Next, the gold standard was forsaken, although that action was claimed to be but temporary. Then it was flatly repudiated by law, the President thereafter referring to it as one of the old fetishes of so-called "international bankers."

On October 22, discussing the gold-purchase plan, the idea being to change the value of the dollar much faster by manipulating the price of gold, the President said:

> We are thus continuing to move toward a managed currency.

Mr. President, let us keep in mind the statement that no responsible government would issue bonds to be paid in gold, if it knew that the gold-redemption clause was to be eliminated or that the Government was to go off the gold standard. It took 3 months to accomplish that result, and during those 3 months the Government sold to banks and investors $1,400,000,000 worth of securities, all of them bearing the engraved words, "Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the present standard of value."

On March 9, 1933, the Congress enacted an emergency law investing the President and the Secretary of the Treasury with absolute power to control money and banking, including the power to require all private owners of gold, if necessary, to deliver it up to the United States.

On March 12 the Treasury sold $800,000,000 worth of short-term bonds, called "certificates of indebtedness", and on each bond was engraved the promise to pay in gold.

On March 15, 3 days later, another issue of $100,000,000 of Treasury bills was made.

On April 5, only 20 days later, the President issued an order commanding all private persons and all private banks to deliver by May 1 all their gold possessions.

On April 5, parallel to the President's order commanding privately owned gold to be surrendered, the Secretary of the Treasury issued a statement saying:

> Those surrendering gold, of course, receive an equivalent amount of other forms of currency.

And that is a fairly good statement of what gold-standard money is, in accordance with the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

On April 19 the President proclaimed the embargo on exports of gold.

On April 23, 4 days after the President had proclaimed the embargo on gold exports, thereby serving notice on the world that the American Government would no longer hold its dollar to the gold standard—for that is what the embargo meant—the United States Treasury offered and sold $500,000,000 of short-term bonds called "3-year notes." It issued them in small denominations, and recommended them to small investors; and in the Treasury circular offering these bonds the Government said:

> The principal and interest of these notes will be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value.

People bought them on that representation, unaware that the Government was then writing a law to repudiate that contract.

Five days later the Senate passed the inflation law.

Then, on June 5, responding to the wishes of the administration, the Congress by joint resolution repudiated the gold clause and violated its most solemn pledge without consulting the other party to the contract.

Mr. President, I take the time to point out only that one instance, dealing with the money question, to say nothing about a great number of other issues treated in identically the same way, to indicate that the promise we have that there will be no lowering of the tariff on agricultural products cannot be relied upon. That is not questioning the honesty of the utterance. It is simply calling attention to the fact that promises are not kept when it appears convenient to break them.

Mr. President, I have dealt with our present economic situation. I now propose to indicate by contrast how Great Britain proceeded and what her condition was in 1921. When Great Britain was faced with her most dangerous unemployment problem, and had for sometime before entered upon the system of the dole, and was seriously considering its abandonment, as a necessity, the problem before the Parliament of Great Britain was, What is to be done about the unemployed? Bonar Law was the man who was willing to announce a policy that had been antagonistic to the British idea of trade for more than 70 years. The Prime Minister said that there were three possible alternatives:

One was to abandon the dole; but the consequences of such abandonment at the time could not be fully understood.

The second alternative was to allocate to the various colonies a certain portion of the unemployed.

The third alternative was to adopt the system of protective tariff.

The British had not gone far in the discussion until the idea of giving up the dole without some substitute had to be abandoned. Then the question came as to the allocation of the unemployed. Immediately certain questions arose: First, where to send the unemployed? Who would want them? Second, what would be sent with them? What would be their condition after they were sent away? What would be their feeling about being taken from their old localities, in which their ancestors were born and lived, and sent to foreign parts?

The present administration, under the new deal, evidently was not familiar with the experience of Great Britain; for when the British Government came to inaugurate the program of sending large numbers of the unemployed to various colonies, the whole plan was found to be so impracticable that it was immediately dropped. I had not heard anything about it after that until it was revived here in the United States by the announcement that that would be one of the methods of caring for the unemployed. I assumed that those who were talking about it had not looked into the possible consequences, and I am not at all surprised that we now are hearing nothing more about it.

Great Britain finally was led to the only practicable alternative of the three, namely, to adopt the policy of giving to her own people sufficient work to employ at least a portion of them.

With that statement as a preface I desire to present the problem of Great Britain, and how she was dealing with it back in 1921.

THE EXPERIENCE OF GREAT BRITAIN—THE BRITISH TRADE CRISIS—DEFINITE ACTION ESSENTIAL

There is a striking similarity in the description of conditions in the United States today, as stated by the advocates of the pending bill, and conditions in England in 1921, as depicted in a bulletin of the Tariff Reform League of London. I am about to quote from the Tariff Reform League bulletin; and I should like to have those who do me the honor of listening note the similarity of the condition of Great Britain then with our condition of today.

1. Our overseas trade (i.e., British foreign trade), upon which this country depends for the bulk of its food and raw materials, has dwindled to less than one half of its pre-war volume.

Taking 20 principal countries, including the United Kingdom, investigation of official returns for the latest fully comparable period namely, the third quarter of 1920, shows that the aggregate weight—volume, not value—of exports from these countries amounted to 92.3 percent of the pre-war volume, while exports from the United Kingdom alone were only 41.6 percent of their pre-war volume.

Note that the word "our" refers to Great Britain and not to the United States—

Our exports of United Kingdom produce in 1913 were 91,803,000 tons.

Our exports of United Kingdom produce in 1920 were 39,509,000 tons.

A falling off of nearly two thirds.

For the first 5 months of this year, 1921, our exports of United Kingdom produce, excluding coal, coke, and fuel, were 2,935,000 tons, as compared with 6,324,000 tons in the corresponding 5 months of 1913.

That was about a 2-to-1 ratio.

2. Our chief foreign competitors—Germany, Belgium, the United States, and Japan—are capturing our former markets in all parts of the world, including our own Empire.

Examples: The United Kingdom's share in the total competitive import trade of Australia decreased from 63.2 percent in 1913 to 46.6 percent in 1919, whilst in the same period the United States' share increased from 11.8 to 29.3, and the share of Japan from nil in 1913 to 11.4 percent.

The statement shows that Britain's decrease in that trade was nearly 50 percent while the United States increased her trade by a little less than 200 percent.

The United Kingdom's share in the total import trade of New Zealand decreased from 59.73 percent in 1913 to 37.6 percent in 1918, and the United States' share increased from 9.46 percent to 26.2 in the same period, and Japan's share from nil to 4.3.

The United Kingdom's share in South Africa's import trade decreased from 54.4 percent in 1913 to 45.5 percent in 1919, whilst the United States' share increased from 9.5 percent to 24.1 percent, and the Japanese share from 0.3 to 3.8.

3. The chief reason for these adverse conditions is the high price of British goods, both at home and abroad.

Examples are given, comparing British and German prices—and this is very suggestive, because Germany is one of the countries that even then put, and since then has put, much emphasis on efficiency in manufacturing:

Examples: German steel bars, £10 a ton; British, £16 to £17 a ton. German magnetos, £5; British, £12 to £15.

In other words, in Britain the price was more than double that in Germany—

German gramophones, £3. British, £7.

German rock-cutting machine, £650. British, £1,200.

And so it goes. These items are only a few that I have taken, but about the same ratio is shown throughout:

German chucks, 17s. 7d. each. British, 54s. 6d. to 58s. each.

German 3-jaw chucks, £2 3s. 7d. each. British, £6 0s. 8d. each.

Meat-cutting machines: German price, £295. British price, £500.

Eighteen tenders were presented for a 10,000-kilowatt turbo alternator, including British, French, German, and various other manufacturers, with the following result:

German price, £47,000, delivered in 10 months.

British price, £84,000 and £95,110, deliveries from 12 to 18 months.

4. The price of British goods is high because of (a) high taxation and high cost of raw materials and (b) low production coupled with high wages.

The report proceeds:

5. We are being undersold in the world's markets by Germany and other countries because—

(A) Taxation is lower in these countries than it is here—

Meaning Great Britain—

(B) Production is higher in these countries than it is here.

(C) Wages are lower in proportion to production in these countries than they are here. In the case of Germany, owing to this fact and the depreciated value of the mark, wages are only about one fourth the value of British wages.

(D) These countries control their own home markets, which absorb three fourths of their normal production, and this enables them to maintain a large output.

Mr. President, if we take those facts, and in their light look into our own situation, the similarily is most striking. Although Britain has a free-trade background of many years, if she could have her own labor employed to produce the commodities she consumes, instead of letting them come in from Germany, she would have some relief, and it is the trend on the part of Great Britain ultimately to leave the field of free trade for, at least, a modified form of protection.

Although there is a marked similarity in the condition of British trade in 1921, as described by this bulletin, with conditions in the United States at the present time, as pictured by the official spokesmen of the administration, there was a very decided difference in the remedy proposed in Great Britain compared with that submitted for our approval here. This will be apparent as I continue to read from the bulletin:

6. If this country (i.e. Great Britain) is to recover and increase its trade in overseas markets, we must produce cheaper, and in order to do so, we must command a large and prosperous trade in the home market.

I ask if that does not sound like the American protective-tariff principle? We must produce more of our needs, and we must maintain our home market.

This can only be accomplished by the adoption of a trade policy which will secure the control of British markets in the interests of British production, and the essential basis of such a policy is a national customs tariff.

There is the first official statement of the British authority, as expressed in this bulletin, that the British have got to go on the basis of protection.

Up to this time, Mr. President, the labor question has not been discussed. I now will cite some of the statements in this bulletin on that particular phase of the problem:

THE INTEREST OF LABOR

No one is more interested than the British working man in the adoption of such a policy. The dominant feature of the industrial situation today is the justifiable demand of labor for the maintenance of high wages and a higher standard of living than was possible before the war. It is more necessary today therefore than ever before to convince our industrial workers—

Does that not sound like the policy of Henry Clay, of William McKinley, of Samuel J. Randall, and of other leading Democrats who believe in the protective tariff—and we have many of them who at least believe in the protection of specific articles?

This bulletin goes on to say:

1. That wages can only come from production.

2. That high wages, if obtained from low production, necessarily mean high cost of production and therefore high prices. That is to say, when wages are high and goods are scarce the purchasing power of money is low. High wages from low production do not therefore ensure a high standard of living.

That is splendid American doctrine. I quote further from the bulletin:

3. That high wages, if obtained from high production, permit of low cost of production and therefore the possibility of low prices. Under such conditions goods are plentiful and the purchasing power of money is high. High production must therefore accompany high wages if a high standard of living is to be maintained.

That is a splendid illustration of our modern formula of efficiency production—a better article this year, produced at a lower price by labor paid at a high price, and put on the market on a margin of profit. That is the formula of modern industry, and, though stated in other words, that is what this British bulletin suggests:

(4) That wages—whether high or low—can only be assured to the worker if the industry which pays the wages is protected against unrestricted foreign competition.

There is a recital of the experience of what we used to call "free trade" England, and that is the remedy that was considered and applied in order to surmount the difficulty in 1921.

I shall now proceed to enumerate the acts of Great Britain leading to the protection of home industries in order to provide employment for her unemployed.

The Safeguarding of Industries Act and later legislation of an even more pronounced protectionist character was England's method of meeting the crisis. She restricted competitive imports, safeguarded domestic industries, put people then on the dole back on the pay rolls, and shielded her own industries and those of her colonies with imperial preferential tariffs.

Throughout Europe, as was the case in England, since the World War it has been the aim and object of the various nations to solve first their domestic problems, find employment for their own people, safeguard their own industries, and establish wherever they could new industries, in order that production might be diversified, the national life enriched by new opportunities for the employment of labor and capital, and the national economic system so developed and strengthened that it would be less dependent upon foreign sources of supply.

While this program of national development is more difficult for the nations of Europe than it is for the United States, nevertheless it has proceeded to some considerable extent, and national needs heretofore supplied by international trade have been supplied from domestic sources to a larger extent than was formerly the case.

Because of the lack of natural resources and of restricted area, with the necessary absence of varied climatic conditions suitable to a wide variety of agricultural production, there is much more economic interdependency on the part of the nations of Europe than is the case with the United States, which spans the richest section of a continent endowed by nature with unparalleled resources, with a tropical, semitropical, and temperate climate, and blessed with a skilled, inventive, and industrious people unmatched anywhere in the world, past or present.

Europe, with an area of 3,800,000 square miles, is divided into some 25 nations of varied nationalities, religions, customs, and laws, separated by artificial tariff barriers.

The United States, with an area, exclusive of its insular possessions, of 3,026,789 square miles, is one Nation, under one Constitution and one flag; with a united people speaking one common language, actuated by a common purpose, and moving forward to a common destiny with uninterrupted freedom of trade representing the greatest buying power in all history.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Europe, crisscrossed as it is with national boundaries, populated with 330,000,000 of people of divided allegiance, of diverse interests, with age-long feuds, animosities, and suspicions, should have, as Washington pointed out many years ago, a set of primary interests distinct from our own. It is not surprising that they have adopted measures and resorted to practices peculiarly adapted to their political and economic system.

We are told that we should follow their example. We are told by the spokesmen of the administration that we should adopt their methods. We are urged to adopt a bargaining tariff system because Europe has it. What about our own, our American system, the system adopted by Washington and approved by Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and an almost unbroken line of American Presidents and by almost all our most illustrious statesmen?

It is a system recommended by Hamilton's famous report on manufactures, founded upon our unmatched natural resources, adapted to our climatic conditions and the spirit and enterprise of our people.

It is the mainspring of our national development. It has enlarged to an unrivaled extent the domestic market for agricultural products. It has encouraged manufactures. It has diversified our industries. It has led to a more abundant life for the American people than any other economic system in the world. No other eulogy of the American system is needed than that uttered by Woodrow Wilson in an article in the North American Review of October 1909, when he said:

> The principle upon which the system of protection was originally founded was the development of the country, the development of the resources of the continent, and the skill of the people. The principle is intelligible and statesmanlike, especially in a new country. Hamilton's position, the position of those who have intelligently and consistently followed him, is defensible enough. Nobody now doubts that the policy of Hamilton put the Nation under a great stimulation, gave it the economic independence it needed, immensely quickened the development of its resources and the power of its people.

Because of the efforts to widen opportunities for employment and secure a greater distribution of labor an increasing proportion of our population was finding employment in manufacturing, mining, and mechanical pursuits. In 1860 we were no longer a people devoted almost exclusively to agriculture. By 1880 only 49 percent of our population were engaged in agriculture, lumbering, and fishing; 25 percent in manufacturing, mining, and mechanical employment; and 12 percent in trade, transportation, and clerical work.

The Nation's industrial expansion under the policy of protection continued throughout the 40 years following the census of 1880, and the census of 1920 graphically depicts the progress that was made. According to the census reports of that year, 27 percent, or a fraction over one fourth, of our population was engaged in agriculture, lumbering, and fishing; 33 percent in manufacturing, mechanical pursuits, and mining; and 25 percent in trade, transportation, and clerical work; leaving but 15 percent for all other pursuits.

The enlightened vision of Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson was reaching its full achievement, and the efforts of American statesmanship for the diversification of our industries, the distribution of our labor, and the development of a well-rounded industrial system, through the encouragement and protection of agriculture and manufacturing, were accomplishing some of the results hoped for at the initiation of the program.

I wish to call attention to that particular phase which evidently is a product of our protective-tariff system. We have about as many people engaged in manufacturing as in agriculture, and about as many in each of those industries as we have in other fields; so we have today, through the legitimate operation of this American system, a population equally divided in the various lines of activity. Today the energies of our people and the population of our country are almost equally divided between agriculture, manufacturing, transportation, trade, clerical work, and professional or domestic service.

No nation on earth shows such a wise and beneficial balance of human effort and human service. In no other nation are there such opportunities for agriculture, manufacturing, trade, and professional and clerical service. No economic or fiscal system devised by the ingenuity of man has brought such far-reaching results, such widespread development, and such far-flung benefits as the so-called "American system."

Yet it is this system that the political descendants of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Andrew Jackson, and Woodrow Wilson now ask us to abandon, and in its place to accept the European system; to give up the American policy of protection to agriculture, of encouragement to manufactures, of equality of treatment to all nations, and adopt the European system of bargaining tariffs. Notwithstanding our efforts, within our constitutional limitations, to introduce into our tariff system more flexible methods of tariff adjustments, foreign countries, and particularly European countries, have, it is true, a far more flexible and expeditious method of effecting tariff changes than we have. This is possible because of the fundamental difference in their form of government. These other governments are not bound by strict constitutional limitations as we are. They have not the sharp distinction between legislative and executive power that is laid down in our Constitution. They are not hampered by a provision of fundamental law. In those countries where the executive is a constituent part of the Parliament, or where the legislative branch of the government is less restrained by constitutional limitations than is the American Congress, wide power to impose or to change customs duties may be conferred upon executive officials or administrative boards without submission to or ratification by the legislature.

Under the cabinet system of government, generally denominated "responsible ministry", the legislative program is controlled by the "government" of the day. When the government proposes a bill and insists on its passage, the legislature must pass it or resort to one of two alternatives—either to force the resignation of the cabinet, permitting the opposition to take over responsibility, or to ask the sovereign to prorogue Parliament and send the issue directly to the voters for approval or disapproval. Such executive control of legislative procedure makes it also comparatively simple for ministers to obtain the routine enactment of minor measures, for instance, bills confirming provisional orders, as in Great Britain.

A large part of the tariff rates actually enforced in France, Spain, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, and other European countries are finally determined, not by the legislature, but by treaties negotiated by the executive, though these treaties are submitted to the legislative bodies for amendment, and the treaties are sometimes made provisionally effective before ratification. Especially during the war nearly all the governments of Europe controlled tariff rates by executive decree; but even in times of peace many governments have granted much wider powers to the executive than has been the custom in this country.

Under stress of the ever-increasing complexity of modern administration and of the growing difficulty of passing complicated measures through Parliament, the expedient of delegating legislative powers to executive authorities has been resorted to more and more frequently. Present-day acts of the British Parliament have a tendency to lay down a few broad general rules or declarations of principles, leaving details to be worked out on those general lines by the legislature, and brought into force by administrative regulations or statutory rules.

But the Parliament of Great Britain has been consistently cautious in its delegation of legislative powers, insisting that they be carefully expressed and limited, and not unfrequently reserving to itself some kind of control over the powers delegated. The judicature act amendment (1875) for an early example, and the tithe act (1891), required that every order in council and rule of court made in pursuance of it be laid before each House of Parliament within 40 days after being made, subject to being annulled on an address from either House. The board of agriculture act (1889) stipulates that the draft of any order in council made under the act shall be laid before each House for not less than 30 days, during which time it can be rejected by an address of either house against the draft, or any part of it, without prejudice, however, to the making of any new draft order.

In changing her policy from a tariff for revenue to a tariff in part protective, Great Britain entrusted large powers to the executive. The safeguarding of industries act, 1921, enumerated certain products of key industries to be dutiable at 33⅓ percent ad valorem; but the board of trade was empowered to include other articles in the list and to exclude articles improperly included. That is to say, the board defined in detail what articles were included in such phrases as "optical instruments", "scientific glassware", "laboratory porcelain", and "synthetic organic chemicals." There have been a considerable number of additions and exclusions. In Great Britain, confirmation by Parliament of executive orders usually means that the orders are confirmed wholesale in a routine way; but owing to the acuteness of the controversy over free trade and protection, the confirmation of orders under this section of the law was at times hotly contested.

The special act for the protection of the dyestuffs industry in Great Britain provides for a licensing system, and the determination of the articles and the quantities to be admitted is left to the board of trade. Many Senators will recall that when we first discussed the protection of synthetic dyes, a very powerful argument was offered in both branches of Congress to the effect that we should do it by the licensing system, because it had been adopted by Great Britain. The law establishes the procedure to be followed, and prescribes the establishment of certain committees, but the acts of the board of trade are not submitted to the confirmation of Parliament.

TARIFF POLICIES IN THE DOMINION OF CANADA

Mr. President, a discussion of the tariff policy of the colonies of Great Britain is a most interesting line of study.

In sections 286–301 of the Canadian customs act (R.S., ch. 48) the powers of the Governor-in-Council are set forth under 40 heads or subheads. Most of the powers relate to administration rather than to the substance of the tariff. A similar broadly discretional power over tariff duties was conferred on the Governor-in-Council in 1922, in the following terms:

> If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor-in-Council on a report from the Minister of Customs and Excise, that natural products of a class or kind produced in Canada are being imported into Canada, either on sale or on assignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers, the Governor-in-Council may, in any case or class of cases, authorize the Minister to value such goods for duty, notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, and the value so determined shall be held to be the fair market value thereof (act of 1922, ch. 18, sec. 3).

TARIFF CHANGES IN AUSTRALIA

In Australia's tariff act, 1921, provision was made for the flexibility of rates in 75 instances by use of the elastic clause, as prescribed by departmental bylaws, meaning bylaws made by the minister of trade and customs. Such bylaws have been issued altering the customs duties in three different ways:

First. Permanently classifying, under certain of the elastic numbers, commodities theretofore unclassified.

Second. Transferring commodities from other items to a special elastic one, thereby, until a new order is issued, establishing a new rate of duty.

Third. Altering duties temporarily, frequently for a single day.

The tariff board act, 1921–24, of Australia provided for the appointment of a tariff board consisting of four members, to be appointed by the governor general for a term not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years. One of the members shall be an administrative officer of the department of trade and customs, who shall be appointed chairman of the board. The declared purpose of the tariff board is to assist the minister in the administration of matters relating to trade and customs.

TARIFF TRENDS IN FRANCE

In France taxes can be laid or abolished only by law—law of June 1, 1864, and repeated annually in the budget act. However, a large measure of control over tariff matters has been delegated by French law to the executive, not only during the war but also before and since. This power to change tariff duties is exercised by decrees issued by the council of ministers, the decrees being submitted to the chambers for ratification within a period stated.

Mr. President, I have made a rather hasty recital of the efforts of these countries to drift away from the free-trade policy and to embracing some form of protective policy.

We are frankly told that we should grant this power to negotiate tariff bargains because other governments have such power, and because such authority in the hands of the Executive is necessary in order to increase our foreign trade. It is this European practice which has appealed to this administration. Such authority has been vested in European activities for many years. But has it increased the foreign trade of European countries; has it opened export markets for them to any appreciable extent? Commerce between European countries and world trade in general during 1932 was at its lowest ebb when stated in depreciated prices. It has been alleged that this is due to the high tariffs and the trade barriers and restrictions which have been set up since the World War.

It is true that tariffs have been raised throughout the world and that trade barriers have multiplied. In some cases these tariff increases have been made for purely bargaining purposes in order that reductions may be made as a concession for tariff reductions by other countries.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], only the latter part of last week emphasized this particular point and illustrated, in a tariff discussion, that often the rates are not raised as a basis of protection or for revenue but because they are to be used in trading, and the desire is to have them high enough so they may be reduced 50 percent and still be within the safety zone.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the opinion to which he adverts, and which I uttered in the debate on Friday, is based upon official credentials. I call to the Senator's attention Document No. 7 of the Seventy-third Congress, first session, in which the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission makes this specific statement:

Unless a reciprocity policy is handled with skill, it may succeed in obtaining no concessions other than removal of those high rates, trade barriers, and discriminations which foreign countries have erected or maintained for the very purpose of bargaining them away.

Mr. President, that is not the worst of it. I continue reading from the same official document, which comes from the same source which now recommends to us this amazing policy against which the Senator so eloquently inveighs:

Since 1919 there is evidence that the increasing of tariff rates and the erection of barriers, principally for use in bargaining, has grown rather than diminished. Accordingly the difficulty of making a reciprocity policy yield net reductions in foreign tariffs has increased rather than diminished as the bargaining countries have attained greater experience.

We have attained no experience. We are undertaking to cope with those who for 10 years have been engaged in this practice of manipulation.

Even that is not the end of the warning which comes to us in this official document. I intrude upon the Senator's good nature with this one final interruption.

Mr. FESS. I very gladly yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I quote against the same authority:

In fact, a worse result might follow from a reciprocity policy announced but not rapidly executed.

In other words, the European manipulation, putting tariffs up for the mere purpose of bargaining them down, has come to be such a scientific success that, except as we may be in a position to act swiftly and promptly—and everybody knows we are not going to act in that fashion—we stand to lose even the trade which we now possess.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is absolutely correct in that warning. I am glad he reinforces what he said the other day, and what I am saying now, by the recitation of a statement made by the tariff authority of the Government.

I recall with interest the Senator's suggestion the other day that, when we engage in diplomatic rivalry with the trained diplomats of foreign nations we are apt to lose everything we have. I recall a statement made to me by our former Ambassador to Belgium, the famous Brand Whitlock, commenting upon the danger of American diplomats or American financiers undertaking to reach a safe conclusion on the subject of a balanced currency. His statement was, "Our boys would find, before the night was half over, that they had not even a shirt left."

In almost every case of this kind a reciprocal agreement would prove unequal and unjust. That is because of the difference in purpose between European tariff making and ours. We have no rates in our tariff law designedly fixed for bargaining purposes, while that is the ruling motive in many foreign countries. Any concession we should make would be an actual concession and possibly an extremely costly one, whereas many concessions made by foreign countries would be only nominal in character. They follow the custom of the proverbial trader who puts his bid high enough to give him a large margin and still leave him in the safe zone. A reduction from their higher rate, or bargaining rate, would still leave their intermediate or lower rate sufficiently high to protect their domestic industry, while our tariff rates are supposed to equalize the difference in foreign and domestic costs of production, and any reduction in such rates would open the doors to unequal and unfair competition.

As pointed out in a report on tariff bargaining, submitted to the Senate March 29, 1933, by the Tariff Commission, the one from which the Senator from Michigan has just quoted, there is grave danger, in negotiating reciprocal agreements, that no concessions will be obtained "other than removal of those high rates, trade barriers, and discriminations which foreign countries have erected for the very purpose of bargaining them away."

The report continues—

there is evidence that the increasing of tariff rates and the erection of barriers, principally for use in bargaining, has grown rather than diminished. Accordingly, the difficulty of making a reciprocity policy yield net reductions in foreign tariffs has increased rather than diminished.

The report points out that—

Many countries are maintaining emergency tariff rates and trade barriers—

the possibility that the United States would obtain in return for its tariff concessions only the abandonment of measures too cumbersome and oppressive, and of tariff rates too high, to outlast the depression * * * and reciprocal tariff agreements by which concessions were made in return for the reduction of such temporary duties might mean the grant of valuable concessions in return for totally illusory concessions.

I quote from pages 9 and 10.

The European tariff bargaining system offers us no promise of real or substantial benefits, and the results it has accomplished so far do not commend it to us as a model for us to follow. Even if it were extended to the free list, as has been suggested in certain quarters by some economists, it must not be overlooked that such practices could not only be in violation of the very foundation principle of the protection system, for the preservation of which we must resist this European proposal of bargaining tariff. Duties on goods not produced in this country would insure revenue, and as a revenue-only tariff, would be justifiable. But the policy violates the principle of duties for the encouragement of American industry on behalf of investment of American capital in the employment of American labor. It is fundamental with protectionists that duties on noncompeting articles, such as coffee, must be resisted to avoid the burden upon all our people of paying a tax in the form of customs duties which cannot be shifted from the American consumer to the foreign producer, as in the case of a protective duty on a competing article.

The proposal to give to the President the power to bargain on noncompeting articles on the free list, either by placing duties on such articles as coffee, for example, or to reduce the quota of such articles, would not only be in violent contravention of the principles of the American system, but it would result in direct opposition to the wishes and interests of the American public. Our refusal to tax these noncompetitive common necessities is not so much to please the foreign producer as to help the American consumer. It is true, as was said on the floor of the Senate, that if the purpose of the bargaining tariff be to conduct successful negotiations without regard to the welfare of our own people, then the free list must be included, just as, if the purpose of imposing tariffs were for revenue only, we should include duties on imports which we must have and do not produce in our country. Neither can be justified.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield again?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to revert for just a second to the discussion we were having respecting the European system of putting up rates in order subsequently to bargain them down. The Senator from Ohio read from the official document to which I had previously referred. He did not read from the document the very significant heading, and I desire to insert it at this point in the debate, because, in a single sentence, it sums up the whole challenge. The heading of this official document reads:

The padding of tariff rates in preparation for bargaining.

Mr. FESS. That is very significant.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President. They have padded their rates. We have not padded our rates. When Uncle Sam goes into the market place in search of that kind of a bargain, he comes home at night in a barrel.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the fact emphasized by the Senator from Michigan must not be overlooked—that we place our duties on the basis of protection. European countries place their duties on the basis of bargaining. Ours are limited to the difference in the cost of production between our country and the country competing with us. We cannot afford to reduce our tariffs. They can afford to reduce their tariffs, because of the different purpose in mind when the rates are fixed.

EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN EXPERIENCE WITH BARGAINING TARIFFS

Our people need not be in the dark on the possibilities involved. In Europe a bargaining-tariff system has been employed for many years, and tariff walls are higher and more numerous there than they have ever been before. Tariff barriers have increased more in tariff-bargaining countries than anywhere else. These European bargaining tariffs are the cause of more jealousy, strife, friction, and negotiations than any other tariff procedure that could be devised. This result is inevitable where no principle is involved, and the only determinant is points for bargaining.

France, for instance, may offer reciprocal concessions to Germany, and immediately England and other countries demand that the same concessions be granted to them. Italy may offer concessions to Russia, and at once the high officials of neighboring nations are stirred with alarms of military or economic alliances. Germany and Austria agree on a reciprocal basis for the free interchange of commodities, and immediately the proposed bargain is thrown into the World Court and annulled. It might have meant the establishment of fairer trade relations between two neighboring states and promoted their economic recovery; but the consummation of this tariff bargain was not permitted, by a World Court vote of 8 to 7, on the ground that it violated Austria's international engagements under the Geneva protocol of 1922.

Of course, I am referring, as the Presiding Officer knows, to the proposed customs union, which, without any question, would have been effective between Germany and Austria had it not been for the determined protest of the former Allies against these two countries, which finally was referred to the League of Nations and later by the League of Nations referred to the World Court.

Years of tariff bargaining in Europe show that the main purpose of the negotiations is national security, the enlargement of national influence, and alliances either of a political or an economic character. They are entered into for strategic purposes, and are not consummated through the sacrifice of domestic industries or at the expense of domestic labor. Whatever else might be said of the American foreign policy, we have learned the wisdom of equal treatment of all nations with no discrimination, never asking for any treatment we were not willing to grant others.

Not only have we the experiences of Europe to caution us against such an unwise course, but we have our own unfortunate, unsuccessful, or abortive experiments with bargaining tariffs. The few times when any suggestion to modify this principle was made, it failed of its purpose. In our early tariff legislation we proceeded on the theory of equal treatment to all nations. The limited occasions in the past when it seemed mutually advantageous to enter into a particular tariff agreement with some particular country are conclusive in results. Entertaining originally the intention of offering equality of treatment, special commercial relations that were entered into with certain nations resulted in inequality of treatment. Our history along this line is of value in this discussion.

Prior to 1890 the United States attempted to negotiate tariff treaties with six countries—with the German Zollverein in 1844, which was not ratified; with Canada, in 1854, which was ratified, but abrogated in 1866; with Hawaii in 1875, which was ratified and extended in 1887, remaining in effect until 1900; with Spain, in 1884, for Cuba and Puerto Rico, which was not ratified; with the Dominican Republic, in 1884, which was not ratified; and two treaties with Mexico, the first of which, in 1856, was not ratified by the Senate, and the second of which, though ratified by the Senate, never became effective because the necessary legislation was not enacted by Congress.

The treaty with the Zollverein was not ratified by the Senate. The treaties with Spain and the Dominican Republic, negotiated by President Arthur, were withdrawn from the Senate by a great Democratic President, Grover Cleveland, and never resubmitted. A treaty with Great Britain relating to the British West Indies, which had been in process of negotiation, was not consummated because the British Government withdrew from further negotiations when it learned the fate of the Spanish treaty. So, out of these protracted efforts to secure tariff bargains, only two treaties—those with Canada and with Hawaii—became effective.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has the Senator from Ohio in his investigation found where a Chief Executive has ever asked for authority so extensive as asked for in this legislation?

Mr. FESS. No; there has never been a case in our history when any President asked for any such authority as this.

Mr. HATFIELD. And in all the reciprocity relations that heretofore have existed between this country and other nations, it was necessary to have the approval of the Senate before they were put into effect.

Mr. FESS. Oh, certainly. In other words, there never was any effort to make a bargain with any country except through treaty channels, and the treaty had to have the approval of this body.

Mr. HATFIELD. What vote does it take on the part of the Senate to approve such treaty?

Mr. FESS. Two thirds.

The treaty with Canada remained in force only 11 years. It was abrogated by the United States because of the hostile sentiment aroused against Canada during the Civil War, because of the need of additional revenue and because of the dissatisfaction of the fish, coal, and lumber industries of the United States.

The Hawaiian bargaining treaty led to grave international complications. When the treaty went into effect the British Commissioner to Hawaii notified the Hawaiian government that under the most-favored-nation clause of the British-Hawaiian Treaty of 1851—

> Her Majesty's Government cannot allow of British goods imported into the Sandwich Islands being subjected to treatment other than that which is accorded to similar goods of American origin.

The German Government also raised the question of most-favored-nation treatment, although it had no treaty with Hawaii upon which to base a claim.

The British Government insisted upon its claims, and Hawaii sent an envoy to Europe to negotiate with the British and German Governments. The American minister wrote to James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State, that "the British claims are still held over the head of the Hawaiian government."

The situation called from Mr. Blaine the emphatic statement to the Hawaiian government that—

> This Government cannot permit any violation, direct or indirect, of the terms and conditions of the treaty of 1875. The treaty was made at the continuous and urgent request of the Hawaiian government. It was expressly stipulated "on the part of His Hawaiian Majesty that so long as this treaty shall remain in force he will not make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges relative to the admission of any article free of duty hereby secured to the United States."

So runs the quotation from our then Secretary of State, James G. Blaine, to the Hawaiian government.

> The extension of the privileges of this treaty to other nations under the most-favored-nation clause in existing treaties would be as flagrant a violation of the explicit stipulation as a specific treaty making the concession. The Government of the United States considers this stipulation as of the very essence of the treaty and cannot consent to its abrogation or modification, directly or indirectly.
> If any other power should deem it proper to employ undue influence upon the Hawaiian government to persuade or compel action in derogation of this treaty, the Government of the United States will not be unobservant of its rights and interest and will be neither unwilling nor unprepared to support the Hawaiian government in the faithful discharge of its treaty obligations.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. It was the then distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, who initiated the idea of reciprocal trade agreements, was it not?

Mr. FESS. It was.

Mr. HATFIELD. Possibly he was the pioneer in that movement, was he not?

Mr. FESS. He was.

Mr. HATFIELD. But he never thought of asking the Congress of the United States to abrogate its power in favor of the Chief Executive in carrying out the idea of reciprocal trade relations?

Mr. FESS. Certainly not. The Senator from West Virginia is emphasizing the importance of the historic fact that what has been done in the effort toward reciprocal tariff arrangements in this country, which has usually been linked with the names of Blaine, McKinley, and others, cannot be cited as a justification for the pending proposal, for that now before us is as different from the previous proposals as the day is from night.

This threatening controversy led to a change of ministry in Hawaii and to the acceptance, finally, of the position taken by America's dauntless Secretary of State. Thus, of the two bargaining tariffs negotiated prior to 1890, one could not stand the stress of war-time passions and the dissatisfaction of injuriously affected industries, and the other drew us into the dangerous whirlpools of international complications. This is our history of tariff bargaining through the constitutional channel of treaty making down to 1890.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. If that be true, the complications resulting from the pending proposal would be far greater than the complications which might have arisen under treaty agreements ratified by the Senate?

Mr. FESS. I should think so. If there were likely to be any liability or any possible involvement incident to a treaty, it would almost certainly be disclosed in the discussion in this body, and the ratification of such treaty would require a two-thirds vote before it could become binding. For that reason I should think that the dangers in connection with reciprocal agreements could be and would be avoided if they could be negotiated through the ordinary channels of treaty making. In the consideration of such a question, the difference between the judgment of 1 man and the judgment of 96 men ought to be considered very outstanding.

Mr. HATFIELD. In other words, the discussion that would necessarily take place amongst the 96 men in the Senate of the United States would bring about such an expression of opinion as would go far toward disclosing and averting any complications or any embarrassments which might result to the Government, as contrasted with what might happen if the entire responsibility were left with the Chief Executive of the Nation and those associated with him representing the executive department of the Government of the United States?

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator's conclusion is justified.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has the Senator given any consideration to the fact that under the responsibility which will go with the enactment of this proposed legislation, the Chief Executive by secret treaty may carry on and make these contracts which will extend over a period of at least 3 years, and for the Congress of the United States to abrogate them in any way will be to repudiate a contract made by the Chief Executive?

Mr. FESS. That involvement is possible. The Senator makes an inference that ought not to be overlooked. We have been asked to give this authority to one man largely because of the difficulty of reaching bargains in the open, which, it is said, could be obviated by reaching them in secret. It has been stated over and over again that that is one of the difficulties we want to obviate by this method.

The suggestion made by the Senator from West Virginia about the safety of having tariff bargaining brought about through the channel of treaty making rather than as an Executive function calls attention to a recent episode that has become very historic. I say what I am about to say not by way of criticism of President Wilson, because I was a great admirer of his, but everyone knows that had the treaty-making power been limited merely to negotiations conducted by the President this country today would be in the League of Nations. I recall how a small group of Senators sent out warning against involvement in that covenant, lest we might become party to it, and I remember how the late President Wilson referred to them as a "band of williful Senators" and how it wrought upon his mind, because he was so completely committed to the idea that that was the greatest single thing he could do in the direction of averting war. I think I do not go too far when I say that the failure to ratify that covenant almost, if not entirely, cost him his life. My own view of the matter is that it would have been a fateful step for this Government to have gone into the League of Nations. I was one of the few Members of the House of Representatives at that time who gave reasons at once after the covenant was first printed on the 14th of February 1919 why we must not become a party to it unless the covenant was amended. I was called down in rather brutal language by my warm friend, William Howard Taft, who was then ex-President, and who said that I "talked like a wild man." I think history since that fight has justified a million times the position that some of us took on the League of Nations controversy.

There is not a person in the country who does not know that had it not been for the opportunity in this body for unlimited debate in opposition to that covenant, thereby getting the facts before the people, we would have taken that step. That, I know, is rather a far-fetched illustration, but it does call attention to the possible danger of giving to the Chief Executive treaty-making power without requiring ratification of the treaty by this body.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. I hardly agree with the Senator that it is a far-fetched illustration. I think it is absolutely in line with the power that is being asked by the Chief Executive to regulate tariff rates. Had the then President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, been given the same power by the Congress of the United States, as the Senator properly has stated, we would now be an integral part of the League of Nations. There is little difference between the power which the present incumbent of the White House is asking and the power which President Wilson failed to ask of Congress before he undertook to negotiate his treaty which would have let the United States into the League of Nations.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator for his interpretation and his opinion.

Mr. President, there is a cycle of thinking in the country, more vocal today than I have ever known, tending to ignore all the lessons of history. It is said that the past holds no lessons for the present nor suggestions for the future. We all well know of the derision of the past by modern statesmen. The lesson of history is offensive to them. To be up to date you must not merely subscribe to all the folly and foibles of the new deal but to be modern and progressive it becomes necessary to ignore the voice of history, to junk fundamentals, embrace revolution in the fatuous name of evolution, and join the economic adventures in their great crusade against the hopeless failures of our fathers and supplant the institutions of 140 years of growth by a modern system, the handiwork of the reformers fresh from the college cloister, too often the incubator of theories—some sound, but most mere fancies—of use when confined to the classroom as mental exercise for students, but dangerously harmful when seriously applied in the field of governmental experimentation.

After 1890 our further experience with bargaining tariffs continued to be disappointing and unsatisfactory. The tariff bill introduced early in 1890 by William McKinley became the vehicle through which the realization of reciprocity ideals was attempted, although the bill as introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. McKinley contained no reciprocity provisions. It is this legislation to which the advocates of the pending measure wrongly allude as a precedent for the present proposal. In a letter to President Harrison, Mr. Blaine said that the lack of shipping facilities to reach the South American markets had been the chief obstacle in the way of increased exports, and pointed out that nearly all articles exported to those countries were subjected to excessive customs duties, and that over 85 percent of the American imports from Latin America—coffee, cocoa, rubber, hides, dye, and cabinet woods—were admitted free of duty. He advised that an amendment should be submitted to the House bill authorizing the President to declare free entry to the products of any nation of the American Hemisphere whenever such nation should admit free of duty American foodstuffs, lumber, furniture, manufactures of iron and steel, cottonseed oil, and refined petroleum. This amendment, unlike the pending proposal, provided a definite program, authorized by legislation, and did not leave the field of negotiation wide open to Presidential discretion and tariff bargaining upon the sole responsibility of the Executive. It did not violate the taxing power as provided in the Constitution, which remained a legislative function. It was made, as the pending resolution proposes, a Presidential prerogative.

Provisions for this limited, constitutional reciprocity were inserted by the Senate through proper legislative methods, the bill as reported to the Senate having contained, like the House bill, no such provisions.

In a special message to Congress, President Harrison transmitted the letter from Mr. Blaine, and alluding to the statement that over 85 percent of the imports from Latin America were admitted free, he said:

> If sugar is placed upon the free list (as it was in the tariff bill, a bounty being substituted for the duty) practically every important article exported from those States will be given untaxed access to our markets, except wool. The real difficulty in the way of negotiating profitable reciprocity treaties is that we have given freely so much that would have had value in the mutual concessions which such treaties imply.

Mr. Blaine, in a speech on August 29, 1890, said it would be a great mistake to repeal the duties on so large an amount of imports from Latin American countries without an attempt to secure in return reciprocal arrangements which would stimulate our export trade to Latin America. He said that he favored "a system of reciprocity not in conflict with the protective tariff but supplementary thereto." Here is the distinction ignored by the present advocates of tariff bargaining in the pending tariff proposal.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator from Ohio is aware of the fact that there is now in existence a treaty which has been negotiated between the Governments of Colombia and the United States. The authorities representing both sides of the contract, I take it, are waiting for the passage of this measure through the Senate before the treaty is submitted for approval. Does the Senator know anything about that matter?

Mr. FESS. I have not the facts about it.

Mr. HATFIELD. I communicated with the Assistant Secretary of State, Colonel Thayer, and he admitted that such a treaty is in existence and has been in existence since last December. I asked for the substance of the treaty, and he declined to give it to me; but he did send me a news release which dealt with the fact that such a treaty does exist.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator say that the Assistant Secretary of State declined to let the Senator see the treaty?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is very true.

Mr. FESS. I cannot understand that.

Mr. HATFIELD. In my address on May 1 I read the letter which I received from the Assistant Secretary of State and made it a part of my remarks on that occasion.

Mr. FESS. The proper course would be to introduce a resolution in the Senate asking that the information be sent to the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that I am now having prepared a resolution which I shall introduce tomorrow, I hope, with the purpose of asking to have the treaty sent to the Senate. It seems to me that the Committee on Foreign Relations should take up this matter, and bring before it some representative from the office of the Secretary of State with the idea of inquiring into the matter.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIETERICH in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from West Virginia is making an amazing statement.

Mr. FESS. He certainly is.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wonder if I have correctly understood it. Does the Senator from West Virginia state that we have already negotiated with Colombia, through our State Department, a reciprocity treaty which could not be made effective unless this bill should be passed?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is my understanding; and my understanding is based on the conversation I had by telephone with the Assistant Secretary of State, Dr. Sayre.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, the Senator is stating that without waiting for congressional approval of this revolutionary grant of power to the Executive a treaty already has been negotiated, in advance of obtaining such power?

Mr. HATFIELD. Not only is that true, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me——

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. But I understand that there is a tacit agreement between the State Department authorities and the authorities of Germany whereby, if this reciprocal legislation shall be passed, the United States will exchange so many million pounds of lard for so many dyes that will be manufactured by German chemists instead of being manufactured in the United States of America, as is the case at the present time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope the Senator will persist in his proposal to inquire by resolution whether there are any existing commitments in the State Department in respect to this subject.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that I am having the resolution prepared, and it is my purpose to submit it tomorrow.

May I make a further observation?

Mr. FESS. Just a moment. The serious thing is not that such a treaty is being framed but that a Senator is denied, by a responsible member of the State Department, the opportunity of knowing what the treaty is. That is a serious situation; and I do not think there is any Member of this body who will not say that we want all the facts with regard to it.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the Senator from Ohio that the office of the Secretary of State has made the record, and it is to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 1. I may say further to the Senator, respecting the imports that heretofore have come from Colombia to the United States, that 90 percent of them are represented by coffee and crude oil.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the Senator from West Virginia takes his seat, let me inquire whether the Senator understands that a large quantity of tallow is about to be moved into this country, and that there have been tentative negotiations along that line? I have received, through such sources as were available to me, the information that negotiations are in process to move a large quantity of tallow into this country.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I have not had any information upon that subject; but I have good reason to believe that there are many movements in the direction of reciprocal treaties which will involve not only the agricultural industries of this country but the chemical industry and many other industries.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator from West Virginia is correct in the understanding of this matter that he has expressed, it is positively the most astonishing thing that has come to my attention. I have never said, here or elsewhere, very much about the trend toward assumption of Executive authority. I have felt it deeply; and the evidences are cumulative that we are rapidly drifting into a stage of assumption of Executive authority that the country will not tolerate. This is one of the items. It is an absolutely unbelievable thing to me.

Now, I shall proceed with the history of what is known as the "McKinley reciprocity proposal."

The McKinley Tariff Act was approved October 1, 1890, and contained provisions for reciprocity through penalty duties prescribed by Congress itself on five specified commodities—sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides—which were to be imposed automatically when these commodities were imported from countries whose duties on American products were, in the opinion of the President, "reciprocally unequal and unjust." Please note that these provisions were punitive, embodying penalty duties. Thus the reciprocity provision of the act of 1890 was based on the principle of penalizing, not on that of promising tariff reductions in return for supposititious and dubious concessions. That proposal was legislative and not Executive, and it was punitive to insure protection, not to abandon it.

Ten reciprocity agreements were arranged under the terms of the McKinley Act, most of them being designed, especially on the part of Germany and some other countries, to obtain the advantage of shipping beet or cane sugar into our market free of duty.

In 1892 Grover Cleveland was for the second time elected President, and with him a Democratic House and Senate. A tariff bill was introduced in December 1893 and approved October 3, 1894. This Democratic tariff law of 1894 repealed the reciprocity provisions of the act of 1890. The report of the Ways and Means Committee declared that these provisions had brought "no appreciable advantage to American exporters." Further to insure the repeal of the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley law, the House of Representatives passed a resolution specifically providing for repeal.

The Republicans regained control in 1896. In the meantime popular sentiment for reciprocity had gained headway, and the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 reincorporated provisions designed to secure reciprocal concessions and advantages. The President was authorized, by specific legislation enacted by Congress, to negotiate with the governments of countries exporting argols, crude tartar, brandies, wines, paintings, or statuary with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions might be made.

John A. Kasson, of Iowa, was appointed a special commissioner to negotiate agreements under the provisions of the act. In December 1899 the Kasson treaties were submitted to the Senate; but no action was taken in 1900 and 1901 beyond extending the time limit for ratification. Mr. Kasson strongly supported ratification, contending that the treaties were unquestionably consistent with the principles of protection; that the United States was not sufficiently sure of its foreign markets to abandon a policy of reasonable protection for its home market; but he contended the home market was so safeguarded for American producers as to justify moderate concessions to aid the export trade. Disheartened by the failure to ratify the treaties, Mr. Kasson resigned in March 1901. Action on the treaties was abandoned, and no mention of reciprocity was contained in President Theodore Roosevelt's message of 1904.

In 1903 the convention with Cuba was ratified.

In 1903 an agreement for special treatment of United State imports into Brazil was arranged.

In 1909 President Taft arranged with the Canadian Government for a reciprocity agreement between the United States and Canada, but Canada refused to ratify it in 1911.

This, in brief summary, recounts our experiments with reciprocal and bargaining tariffs. It is not a record that prompts us to look with favor upon President Roosevelt's prescription of bargaining tariffs for economic ills, and for the expansion of our foreign trade. We are now told that we can no longer rely upon the treaty route. It is too difficult to reach conclusions. Delay in ratifying treaties, or the failure of the Senate to ratify some proposed treaties, cannot justify, as is claimed by spokesmen of the administration, the abandonment of legislative precedents, the violation of constitutional limitations on the power of the Executive, and the abrogation of the rights and prerogatives of Congress, as proposed in this bill. If a treaty cannot win the approval of the Senate as the Constitution provides, it is far better that we have no such treaty, and it is surely no justification for unconstitutional procedure.

If a treaty affecting the mining, fishing, agricultural, or manufacturing industries of the country cannot obtain the consent and approval of the legislative branch of the Government, it is for the best interest of our country that we have no such treaty.

The unimpaired maintenance of our constitutional checks and balances as between legislative and executive functions, and the continuance of our democratic form of government, are of vastly more importance than foreign markets purchased at the sacrifice of our rights and liberties. As a general rule the negotiation of just and equal reciprocity treaties is an intricate, difficult, and exacting task. To be fair to all domestic and foreign interests involved is well-nigh impossible. Of such treaties as we have entered into in the past, few, if any, have proven satisfactory, and most of them soon outlived whatever usefulness they had. These results do not argue for speed, but rather caution and the taking of time. It is claimed that if we could rush into them more speedily, avoid the delays encountered in the past, eliminate the constitutional right and duty of the Senate to advise and concur, and confer upon the President the sole power to negotiate and approve the compacts, we would be equipped with an instrumentality to solve the economic problems of a troubled world.

Mr. President, it is this trend which must be alarming to every student of our American system. I wonder how many people realize how far we have drifted away from the constitutional barriers, checks, and balances which hold nicely in their relationship the judicial and legislative branches of the Government.

I was tremendously impressed with the possible involvement of President Roosevelt's closing address to the House of Represenatives and the Senate in joint session, when, appearing before us to ask for a certain type of legislation, he made the statement frankly that what we needed in this country, in contradistinction to the equal power of the coordinate departments, was a union of these departments. Those were his words.

Where is the student who can comprehend the full meaning of that? It is the comment not only of American authors, but the best foreign opinion which ever expressed itself on the American system of government, that the one outstanding differentiation between ours and all other governments is that this is the one Government which maintains a strict independence of each of the three coordinate departments, where there is an interdependence in relationship, but an entire independence in the exercise of their functions. That differentiates ours from every other government on earth today.

Consider Great Britain. What is the power of the King in Britain today? The power there is the House of Commons. Once it was "The King, the Lords, the Commons." Later it became "The King, the Lords, the Commons." But today it is "The King, the Lords, the Commons." That is because the House of Commons have all the power in the British Empire today, both legislative and executive.

Mr. HATFIELD. Why "the Commons"?

Mr. FESS. It is because of the drift toward giving more voice to the people who are represented in the Commons. Here in our own country, born out of the struggle between the executive and the legislative, there is this differentiation, which maintains the absolute independence of the various departments in the exercise of the functions assigned to them.

Why was Thomas Jefferson so bitter against the aggressions of Great Britain? I will state the reason, which all Senators will readily recall. The Legislature of the State of Virginia, of which Thomas Jefferson was a member, was adjourned by a provincial governor appointed by the British King. The great apostle of local government and individual liberty in government, sitting as the elected representative of his own people, to legislate for their welfare, was sent home. By whom? By an officer appointed by the King of Great Britain. That was only one of the incidents which led to a jealousy on the part of our people to maintain a strict relationship between the three coordinate departments. Whatever might have been in the mind of President Roosevelt when he commented upon the change of relationship between the legislative and the executive, when he said that what we need is a union of them, the possibilities are tremendously significant.

There has been much said about the trend toward Executive authority. I am the last who would charge, here or elsewhere, that the President of the United States wants to be a dictator. I do not believe it. But I do say that I am greatly distressed over the step-by-step progress by which we are getting away from the legislature, gradually giving the power over to the Executive.

Mr. President, let me illustrate what I mean; and I am glad to have my learned friend the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] listening to what I am saying, because I know that he and I do not differ very widely in respect of what is in my mind.

These departments have been so sharply differentiated, and they are so jealous of their prerogatives, that the President is always confined in his legislative functions to the signing of a bill or vetoing it, and any effort toward dictating what shall be done, anything beyond a message to inform the people of the state of the Union, is always resented.

For the last 20 years we have been drifting away from that standard, but we have never reached such a stage as that in which we now are. Let me illustrate:

A few days ago a message from the President was read concerning a problem of legislation. The moment the clerk ceased the reading and the message had been ordered referred to the proper committee, the chairman of the committee to which the message had been ordered referred, rose in his place and presented a bill, which had been framed at the White House and sent here, carrying out the principles written in the message. In other words, we are in an emergency situation. We are doing things none of us would endorse. The only excuse is that "These are emergencies, and we have nothing else to do. The President wants us to do it. The American people are back of the President, and therefore we are going to do it."

We get the President's advice; and not only that, but the bill is written at the White House, and then we undertake to put it through as it is written.

Think of doing a thing of that kind 25 years ago! Think of coming before either House of Congress with a bill sent from the White House! It would have created such a furore that it would not have gotten anywhere. Today, however, we say there is nothing else to do; that the President has the responsibility, and the President ought to have the power. He has with him counselors. They ought to be the best. If he believes this is the thing to do, all we will ask him to do is to send it to us, and we will put it through.

That is not wise. We say it is limited to emergencies. Every now and then people raise the question whether or not we are totally abandoning our fundamental American principles. I think we are slipping along that way. Step by step we are doing it.

One of the key men of the present administration appeared in my home town to speak to the students of the college of which he had been a professor before he was given his position in the Government. In that speech he used language which has been used by many of the key men of the Executive Department. He talked about revolution. A friend of mine read a report of the speech in a local paper, and as the two men were very warm friends, my friend wrote to the speaker and said he hoped he was being misquoted. In the letter sent to the speaker who talked revolution, my friend used this language:

> I am convinced that the propaganda of revolution by those temporarily in positions of administrative authority is doing much to defeat recovery. The President, in his recent New York address, stressed the harm being done by fear, and the necessity of substituting confidence for fear before recovery becomes a reality. This is true. Recovery will be unattained as long as fear is the motive of action. No instrumentality can more effectively entrench fear in the minds of men than to promote the idea that this administration stands for revolution.

Then the writer added:

> But I wish to express a thought beyond the fact that such actions are retarding recovery. I, together with millions of Americans, regardless of party, or race, or belief, am giving unswerving loyalty to this administration and to its efforts for recovery. If, under the cloak of this loyalty, this administration is promoting the purposes of revolution rather than of recovery, then a different issue is presented to the country. It is an issue of such unprecedented importance that it should be decided by the country and not imposed upon it by administration officials.

That was written to a leading figure, a man prominent in this administration, in commenting upon his address at the college.

I now read from the letter of this key man, written in reply to the writer of the letter from which I have just read:

> I must say that I was somewhat surprised by your letter of the 17th.
> Apparently you did not take Franklin Roosevelt seriously when he promised that if elected he would inaugurate a new deal. Knowing Roosevelt, I knew that when he said that he was for a new deal he meant a new deal and not a return to the old methods and the old evils. Certainly when the people of the country swept him into office and swept the old dealers out, they were voting for a change in economic arrangements and not for a return of the old economic order.
> In the face of these revolutions we have attempted to conduct our economic life with a set of individualistic ideas adapted to conditions that existed in preceding centuries. The result was bound—

Note this language:

> The result was bound to be antisocial, and, as it turned out, also immoral and irreligious. It is natural, therefore, for those of us who really believe in the new deal to speak of it as a revolution; for we know that the recovery that you seem to think we should aim at is only a return to the old speculation which is to bring again in turn the old depressions and ruin in its wake.
> Whatever you may think of President Roosevelt's new deal, you certainly cannot accuse him of misleading the people of the country into thinking that all he wanted was recovery of things as they were. He referred the other night over the radio to the "edifice of recovery" that his administration was attempting to construct—

This man, who happens to be a personal friend of mine, who is a very brilliant scholar, and who is a great social force in America, and who was called to Washington because of his great prestige, makes no apology. He wanted to get away from what he said is antisocial, immoral, irreligious. What is it? It is the capitalistic system, it is the individualistic system which he is against. People say to me, "Why, this is not the abandonment of any principles in the United States." I am afraid it is.

In view of the fact that I read part of this letter, I think I ought to read the second letter which my friend wrote to this key man in Washington, who, as I said, is also a friend of mine:

> Your revolution, taking from the people their liberties and substituting therefor the State's power, is not a new deal but an old deal which in the experience of humanity has heretofore been a bad one. Such historical inaccuracy affords little basis for confidence in one's ability either to properly appraise the present or to mold the future.

I cannot agree with such an appraisal of the life of America or of western civilization. It is true that society is not static, and that a free society such as has obtained in America, infused as it is with the principle of living growth, is subject to change and evolution. It is likewise true that society is never perfect, and that every period of our history had had and will have its attendant evils. Those evils have been met and removed through the agency of reform, not of revolution.

I have read this letter publicly now for the first time, although it has been in my possession since November 1933 during all this talk about Dr. Wirt and Professor Tugwell and the others who are constantly quoted here.

Mr. President, is there anyone who does not see a suggestion of revolution in the statement that this is an antisocial, immoral, irreligious civilization of ours which must be reformed? Some persons call it "bloodless" revolution. We have suggestions coming to us to pass over to the President such powers as we have been giving him. We have suggestions to give to the Secretary of Agriculture the power we gave him under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and after 10 months of the most dismal experience we are supplementing it by compulsion, until we are saying to the farmer, "the time will be here when you cannot put a plow in your field or turn a furrow without first getting advice from Washington."

The proposal now is to give to one man or a set of men the power to agree to suspend laws; and then, when such agreements shall be approved by the President, they become the fair-trade practice and have the force of law with the power of imposing a penalty not in the courts, not by a jury, but by the enforcer of the code. Do you say, Mr. President, that does not mean anything; that that is not a trend away from American ideals? It is the most amazing course any nation ever undertook, especially a nation such as ours.

That, Mr. President, is not the only thing that has been done or said. I presume that Dr. Tugwell is one of the clearest-headed thinkers of the numerous experts who have been brought to Washington. Dr. Tugwell has been a rather copious writer as well as a frequent speaker. Nobody, as a rule, can fail to understand him, because he speaks very clear English. In a recent book Dr. Tugwell says:

The flow of new capital into different uses would need to be supervised. * * * If there were a system of planning * * * which allocated to specific industries capital sufficient to produce an amount of goods which would be taken by consumers at the price possible with capacity production, and no more, prices could be lower than they are at present. The surplus-investment capital could then be assigned to other industries.

There is a suggestion, Mr. President, coming from what is pretty generally known as one of the brilliant minds connected with the group of experts here advising the President, that we ought to have a national planning system, with authority in Washington to say how much capital may go to this industry, how much to that, and how much to the other; and that it should be allocated. Think of the possibilities. Could such a plan be hatched in a brain in America with the background of American liberty? My God, what would be the thought of such a man as Thomas Jefferson, if he were alive today, on hearing the doctrine proclaimed that, if a man wants to go into business, the capital to be put in the business is to be allocated to him by authority of the Government?

Then the second principle that Dr. Tugwell enunciates is:

Prices would have to be controlled.

There is price fixing. The citizen is not only told how much he may sow, but how he will reap it; how much he will keep for home consumption; what part he may sell, at what price he may sell it, to whom he may sell it, and under what conditions he may sell it. That is a fine situation, is it not—price fixing?

Third—

Industrial associations are to be set up which must receive certificates of convenience and necessity from the Government, with authority to fix conditions of competition, maximum prices, and minimum wages, working under a control board.

The further you go the worse it gets.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has the distinguished Senator from Ohio any idea as to the amount of money expended by different industries in America yearly in the way of experimentation in order to develop the highest efficiency and to unfold and reveal new processes and uses, all for the welfare of the country?

Mr. FESS. I do not have the figures, but they are tremendously large, I know.

Mr. HATFIELD. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that chemical research and control for the chemical industry and the chemical processing industries is estimated to approximate $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 annually. In fact, Mr. President, there are few, if any, industries in America that could operate successfully without the chemical equation entering into their manufactures. This large sum for research has for its purpose the unfolding of the undeveloped equations in chemistry, thus giving to the American people since the World War a chemical industry sufficient for domestic needs.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I wonder what would be the future of the chemical industry if, instead of its being under the large impulse of aspirations for profit, it were put into the deadening hands of Government and made a regimented industry? Where would it then get? It would be under such an influence as that said to be exercised by the peculiar bird of Australia which, reaching a sleeping citizen, gradually fans him into complete forgetfulness from which he never awakens. That is the situation we are in; and here is the keyman of the present administration offering such contemptible ideas to America; and yet it is said that we are not drifting away from American ideals. I will have something more to say about that later on, not today but at some other time; I am too full for utterance just now.

Mr. President, I now quote from a Representative in Congress who came before the Committee on Ways and Means asking for this proposed legislation:

The situation the world over at this time, as I understand it, is that all of the other countries practically are in a position now, under the tariff system in vogue in those countries, to act promptly through their ministerial or executive branches of the government and to negotiate trade agreements, and we alone are standing out here with such rigidity in our tariff policy that we cannot act fast enough to protect ourselves.

That seems to be one of the spurs which are used for the purpose of urging action on this bill.

In reply to that interrogative statement, Secretary Wallace said:

Yes, sir. Secretary Hull made that point abundantly clear this morning.

I am quoting from Committee on Ways and Means hearings, part I, page 49.

Assistant Secretary of Commerce Dickinson urged the conferring of this tariff power upon the President, "where", as he said, "it can be exercised with speed and promptness." (Ways and Means hearings, pt. 3, p. 30.)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator is aware of the fact that the distinguished Secretary of State when a Member of this body introduced a measure repealing the flexible-tariff provision of the present tariff act?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I remember that, and I think I referred to it in the earlier part of my address. Such a program accentuates the dangers of the proposal to grant this power to the President. It denies to domestic industries fair warning of contemplated changes in the tariff duties under which they plan and conduct their business.

If speed is what is needed and if secrecy is essential, then sacrifice is bound to result. It threatens labor with sudden dislocation and unemployment. It aggravates instead of assuages the troubles and unrest of our citizens and intensifies the dangers inherent in tariff bargaining. It multiplies the faults of the old method and retains none of its merits and safeguards. It involves such grave possibilities that haste should be avoided. I commend the warning of Abraham Lincoln.

As though conscious that this is true, Secretary Hull said in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, part I, page 4:

> It can be stated with emphasis that each trade agreement undertaken would be considered with care and caution, and only after the fullest consideration of all pertinent information. Nothing would be done blindly or hastily. The economic situation in every country has been so thoroughly dislocated and disorganized that the people affected must exercise patience while their respective governments go forward with such remedial undertakings as the proposed bilateral bargaining agreements.

Assistant Secretary of State Sayre said that care, caution, and research would be necessary before negotiations are completed. "The agreement is not going to be made", he said, "until both sides are convinced that there is a sound basis for a trade." (Ways and Means hearings, pt. V, p. 5.)

The argument that this reciprocal trade proposal is necessary to expedite reciprocal tariff bargaining and introduce a new element of speed and promptness into the negotiations is refuted by the admissions of the spokesmen of the administration.

Instead of speed they now suggest a thorough study; instead of rapidity they propose research; instead of promptness they urge patience. In spite of these assurances of caution, the pending proposal carries Executive authority to tax our people by a charge of duty without survey and recommendation of any sort and even without hearing on the part of the citizens to be affected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator take the position that such hearings as may be had should be public?

Mr. FESS. I should think so. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that in matters of an international character where treaties are involved there ought to be an element of secrecy, but when it comes to matters of bargaining or trade, I think open covenants openly arrived at would be the better plan.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why does the Senator distinguish as to hearings between a treaty and an executive agreement? The object of an executive agreement is to make a mutually favorable bargain between the two contracting nations. Does not the Senator realize that if the matter were to be heard in public and at length it would tend to embarrass both the governments which were prospective parties to the agreement and thus prevent the accomplishment of the purpose in mind?

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is drawing a wrong conclusion. Where we are dealing with the tariff we are affecting individuals all over the country involved in the particular industry with which we are dealing, and that ought not to be done in secret.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, if the hearings which are to be held should proceed in the open it would place both parties to the contract at a very great disadvantage with respect to the desires and interests of other nations which are competitors of the contractors in commerce. In other words, if we made public all the details of the proposed bargain, the competitors would attempt to anticipate our success by seeking to obtain a bargain for themselves.

Mr. FESS. I do not agree with the conclusion the Senator has stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator feel that all hearings should be public?

Mr. FESS. I think all hearings dealing with matters like the tariff, or, let us say, trade agreements, ought to be public.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What I cannot understand is why the Senator distinguishes between the tariff and other matters of public concern.

Mr. FESS. There is a wide difference where there is involved a principle of proper international relationship which might contemplate some delicate question which ought to be considered in secret. I have always recognized there is strength in that contention. But where it is a matter of bargaining for a tariff agreement, where we grant some concession and receive some concession, then the hearings should be conducted in the open.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Where a mere trade agreement between two nations is involved, does the Senator feel it is to the advantage of those seeking to enter into the bargain to advise their competitors fully of all they have in mind?

Mr. FESS. Whatever might be accomplished in secrecy, if thereby an error be committed, such error could be avoided if the negotiations had not been conducted in secrecy. I think I am justified in my contention that tariff bargaining should not be conducted in secrecy.

Mr. President, in the light of these facts, with all the efforts of the proponents to overcome the solid objections of the producers and wage earners of the country, to mitigate the dangers of their proposal, and to conciliate the opposition to their program, the pending measure still remains a menace to cordial international relations and a threat to many domestic industries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator realizes, does he not, that our competitors for foreign commerce have been indulging their right to enter into executive agreements or into arrangements similar to the executive agreements contemplated by the pending measure, and that they have already obtained very great advantages over our Government by reason of the agreements which they have heretofore made?

Mr. FESS. And because they did that, ought we to do the same thing?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator does not assume that circumstance has caused hostility on our part toward the foreign nations so promoting their own advantage, does he? Why should we assume that if we shall pursue the course to which they have resorted we will give an affront when they have given us none?

Mr. FESS. I think it is much wiser for us to pursue the American idea than to borrow anything which European countries are practicing. Their interests are not ours.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Under that course, which has prevailed during the last few years, all international commerce has been dwindling and our foreign commerce has been shrinking more rapidly and out of proportion to the foreign commerce of our competitors.

Mr. FESS. It is very obvious that the Senator from Arkansas was not present when I discussed that phase of the subject, because that situation is easily explained.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, the Senator has been speaking now 4½ hours and it has not been possible for me to be present all the time, nor would it be possible for me to remain in constant attendance if he should choose to speak 4½ hours more.

Mr. FESS. I apologize to the Senator. I am likely to speak 4½ hours more if the Senator from Arkansas pursues his present course.

Mr. President, in the light of these facts, with all the efforts of the proponents to overcome the solid objections of the producers and wage earners of the country, to mitigate the dangers of their proposal, and to conciliate the opposition to their program, the pending measure still remains a menace to cordial international relations and a threat to many domestic industries. Abroad it will arouse jealousies and animosities among nations now on friendly terms with us, alienate those nations not included in the agreements or benefited by the bargains, and involve us in international complications and controversies. In this country it will foster ill feeling and discontent among those whose business and employment are sacrified in the supposed interest and for the presumed benefit of other groups and other industries. It flaunts the traditional democratic theory of equal opportunity for all and special privileges for none and runs directly counter to the established American policy of equality of treatment for all nations, which is a basic principle of the American tariff policy.

The people of this country are not willing to abandon the American system and adopt the European system. They will not surrender the protective tariff for a bargaining tariff. They will not approve reciprocity negotiations that are not consistent with the principle of protection, and within the limits of the Constitution. They will not substitute an international game of "you scratch my back and I will scratch yours" for our historic policy of equality of treatment for all nations and adequate protection for our own labor and industries.

America will not barter its birthright for a mess of pottage. It will not surrender constitutional government for a personal government. It will not scuttle the Republic and set up a political or an economic dictatorship.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I shall not ask for a vote on it tonight; but I should like to have it read, so that it will appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following section:

SEC. —. The provisions of this act shall not be used in a manner which will withdraw protection from American workers against those countries which employ cheap labor or who operate under a standard of living which is lower than that prevailing in this country. To this end, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor shall be required to ascertain differences in the wages of labor, and whenever the wages in the foreign country are 20 percent or more below the domestic wage no agreement may be consummated.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, ordinarily any discussion of this bill would lead to the age-old conflict between protectionists and free-traders. Today, however, the theory of protection is up against a strange and new protagonist. The protectionist is given no argument to combat; he is given no facts to prove right or wrong; he is given no ground upon which to prove the claim that protection is right. Instead, he is face to face with abstract and academic theories born in the brains of economists trained under ultra liberal tutelage.

Men who really accomplish things are men who deal in facts and not in abstractions. One Senator was for years an ardent champion of the theory of tariff for revenue only, until suddenly confronted by facts. He suddenly discovered that the copper workers of his State were face to face with the copper workers of foreign countries, and he found the mines and the smelters closing their doors, and whole towns destitute and decaying. He found the roofs of the copper-mine buildings of his State covered with copper sheeting from Chile, paid for by the very men who go into the bowels of the earth in his State and by the sweat of their brow attempt to compete with the men their earnings support.

Such things are facts, and no amount of theory or international reciprocity can correct them.

I should like to deal in facts as they concern the State of Rhode Island, not particularly because it happens to be my State, but because I am most familiar with it, and because I believe it to be representative of the industrial regions of the United States.

The population of the State of Rhode Island is 687,000, with an average of a little over 4 persons in each family. Two years ago, approximately 400,000 Rhode Islanders received their livelihood from the factory pay rolls. In other words, in excess of 95,000 persons were engaged in the manufacture of products for sale.

By far the largest manufacturing industry in the State of Rhode Island is the production of textiles; and in this pursuit there were 57,087 wage earners. In order of their importance, the textile mills produced worsteds, woolens, cotton goods, dyeing and finishing materials, silk and rayon, and lace.

The Secretary of Agriculture has declared, without objection on the part of any other official of the administration, that the manufacture of finer textiles in this country is inefficient and should be sacrificed in order that Belgium, France, and China may sell their textiles to this country. Specifically mentioned in the category of finer textiles is lace goods, in the manufacture of which are employed some 1,100 people in the State of Rhode Island. Two years ago 7,060 persons were engaged in the production of finer textiles other than lace goods, and of these the new deal has already threatened the jobs of some 2,000.

The second largest industry in Rhode Island is the manufacture of metal goods. Divided in order of importance is the manufacture of textile machinery, foundry goods, electrical machinery, and numerous other plants employing from 100 to 2,500 people. A few of these, particularly those engaged in the manufacture of instruments, ornamental ironwork, nonferrous metal products, and gold and silver metal work, have been marked as victims of reciprocity trade agreements. The employees of these industries are to be forced into competition with the employees in similar industries in foreign countries. While the number of employees thus affected is small in relation to the whole of the United States, they nevertheless constitute an important factor in the small community of Rhode Island. They total in number approximately 785.

The jewelry industry ranks third in importance in Rhode Island. Two years ago there were engaged in the manufacture of this product 6,829 persons. Of these, 438 manufactured optical goods; about 100 manufactured jewelry and instrument cases; 1,028 jewelers' findings; and 5,430 manufactured common jewelry. Parts of the jewelry industry will undoubtedly be slated for destruction under reciprocity treaties with the jewelry-manufacturing countries of Europe. Specifically, the importation of optical goods and of certain kinds of cheap jewelry will be encouraged, according to rumors already prevalent among the "brain trust" in Washington. In this category Rhode Island has approximately 1,100 employees.

My State also produces a quantity of rubber goods, which have already met disastrous competition from Japan. It is my understanding that some of the workers in Rhode Island rubber plants found that they could buy Japanese rubber shoes in the stores of Rhode Island for less money than the actual wages they received for the manufacture of such shoes. Under a reciprocity treaty reducing the tariff on these goods, the workers in the rubber industry of Rhode Island could easily be entirely eliminated. Already one of the largest rubber plants in the State has been forced to close its doors, and the homes of the workers are standing vacant, with hundreds of them receiving relief from the State and Federal Governments.

Under the theory out of which this tariff bill was conceived, a minimum of 5,585 Rhode Island workers would lose their jobs. Eleven hundred of these have for years been engaged in the manufacture of lace goods and have no other means of earning a living. The remainder are engaged in the manufacture of optical goods, jewelry, fine textiles, rubber goods, and certain fine metal products. The total number of persons dependent for their livelihood upon the pay checks of these people is over 20,000. Taking Rhode Island as a basic example of the working of the new tariff bill, we would find the jobs of 5,500 persons destroyed and the capital investments which gave them work made worthless.

In compensation for this act the "new dealers" expect an increase in our foreign trade. That is, in return for the money which we would pay Japan, France, Belgium, and other countries for their lace, rubber goods, silk, and jewelry, we should sell them other products, the manufacture of which would theoretically stimulate industrial activity and give work to additional people. In order for this to be successful it would be necessary for the surviving industries to absorb those persons made idle by reciprocal tariffs. It would be necessary for the woolens, worsteds, and cotton goods factories of Rhode Island to absorb some 1,500 employees who had been engaged in the manufacture of lace and other fine textiles. This is on the basis of employment 2 years ago.

We find that from 1929 to 1931 employment in the manufacturing industries of Rhode Island had decreased by 30,000 persons. Among those 30,000 persons are workers who have for years been trained in those industries which might survive reciprocity treaties. It would, therefore, be in the interest of industrial efficiency, as well as common justice, for the surviving industries to absorb the employees who were idle as a natural result of the depression before they could absorb the employees made idle by the artificial effects of tariff reduction and who would be people trained in other lines. By the use of simple logic anyone can conclude that the failure of 5,500 persons to produce lace or jewelry or rubber in order that foreign countries might sell these commodities in the United States could not by the wildest imagination make a market abroad for more than the actual products manufactured by 5,500 persons of equal productive power.

Even if we assume the theorists to be correct, and find that the woolen and worsted industries or the metal industry or some parts of the jewelry industry are able, by virtue of an increased foreign trade, to employ new workers to the extent of those made unemployed by the act which brought about this new foreign trade, it must follow that they would be drawn from the 30,000 persons who were taken from the pay roll of these industries between 1929 and 2 years ago. The natural result would be that we would have 5,500 unemployed citizens of Rhode Island, who are trained in specialized work, and many would find it too late in life to learn new trades. We would experience in the State of Rhode Island not only the destruction of the capital investment in those factories which would close, but as well, a depression in all other plants as a result of a lack of confidence in their fate from day to day, and from a loss of the margin of profit upon which all industry must depend for its very existence.

This is a most conservative prediction, and is based upon declarations of policy already made by officials of the administration who have designated certain industries in this country as inefficient. Actually the possibility of a loss in the industrial production of Rhode Island is much greater. One administration leader declares that "it ought to be evident that among articles the imports of which total less than 5 percent of domestic production, will be found fertile opportunities for a profitable trade bargaining to open closed markets to our products of farms and factories."

In analyzing this statement one can readily refer to the famous resolution requiring the United States Tariff Commission to furnish a list of such products from which the administration might choose those to be used for bargaining with foreign countries.

Further reiterating the policy of the administration, the Secretary of State declared that:

> In shaping its policy and executing its obligations under any agreement, each government should direct its first and greatest efforts toward eliminating the restrictions and reducing the duties which most clearly lack economic justification.
> Particularly (a) duties or restrictions which now completely or almost completely exclude foreign competition, such as those which restrict the importation of particular commodities to less than 5 percent of the domestic consumption thereof.
> (b) Duties or restrictions on articles whose imports have been substantially curtailed since 1929 as compared with domestic consumption.

This was made a declaration of policy by Secretary Hull at the Economic Conference in London and was again reiterated in the conference at Montevideo.

Thus we have two outstanding members of the administration stating the declaration of policy upon which this tariff bill would operate, and we find in the list of products from which would be drawn articles for trading with foreign countries many commodities manufactured in the State of Rhode Island. Among them are cotton goods, yarns and pile fabrics, wool and worsted goods, and silk and rayon manufactures.

Just what will happen as a result of reciprocal trade agreements in these particular industries cannot be predicted. However, it is significant that the cotton goods which I have mentioned, woven wool fabrics, cotton cloth, wool cloth, and silk fabrics, are on all three lists from which will be drawn articles for reciprocal bargaining. It is not unreasonable to assume that reciprocal treaties will be entered into which would more than offset any possible gain which the major industries might expect from favorable foreign-trade balances. It is a lamentable fact that plants manufacturing these products must go through a period of instability, and that those men who have spent their lives in building up a manufacturing business must have a complete lack of confidence in the acts of their government insofar as the prevention of disastrous foreign competition is concerned.

The State of Rhode Island should regard with serious concern the tremendous increase in importations from abroad. Last year bleached cotton cloth was shipped into the United States in the amount of 21,000,000 square yards, which is a record for all time. In fact it is 60 percent above the previous high record in 1929. Printed, dyed, and colored cotton cloth was admitted into the United States last year in the amount of 15,913,000 square yards, which was an increase of 16 percent above 1932. Cotton floor coverings were imported in the amount of 12,200,000 square yards last year, an increase of 126 percent above the year 1929. Cotton yarns were imported in the amount of 1,631,000 pounds, an increase of 29 percent over the year 1932.

The cotton-goods industries of my State cannot continue to face foreign competition of this nature. The tremendous inflow of cotton manufactures cannot help but make serious inroads on the employment of men in the State, and any hope of recovery will most certainly be retarded for many years should these industries be further forced to curtail their operations by reason of reciprocal tariff agreements entered into by men who have never seen a cotton mill.

As I have said before, the manufacture of wool goods is of tremendous importance to the citizens of Rhode Island. Over 25,000 people are normally employed in the woolen and worsted plants alone. Last year these plants witnessed the alarming spectacle of an increase of 88 percent in importations of wool yarns, 37 percent increase in importations of lightweight worsteds, 35 percent increased admissions of heavyweight worsteds, and 37 percent more general woolen goods. The same thing is true in silk manufactures and in the manufacture of knit wear, where the importations increased in 1933 on a range of from 11 percent to 22 percent.

Rhode Island has for a long time been a leading State in the manufacture of files and screws. A substantial percentage of the output of our factories has gone into the export trade. This business has felt severely the effect of the slump in international trade.

The average exportations of files and rasps from the United States between 1926 and 1930 was 2,261,000 dozen, which fell last year to approximately 1,000,000 dozen. Importation of files from Germany and Switzerland increased steadily from 1920 until the adoption of the present tariff law, after which importations fell off rapidly until at the present time only 30 percent of the number shipped into the United States in 1929 are in competition with the American file industry.

Importations consist of ordinary files from Germany and a class of small, fine files called "Swiss-pattern files" from Switzerland. Production of Swiss-pattern files is a specialty in United States industry and forms an important factor in the trade. While importations have never seriously endangered industries of this kind, nevertheless, the decrease in importations from 93,000 dozen in 1929, as a result of the Smoot-Hawley tariff, is of considerable importance to the profitable operation of our plants.

A similar situation exists in the manufacture of other small metal products in the United States, all of which are of first importance in the metal industry of Rhode Island. In the manufacture of such metal products the superior workmanship and superior methods of American plants have made it possible for us to compete with foreign countries, even with our higher wage scales. These industries deserve protection, and we should scrutinize with utmost care any move on the part of Washington professors to delve into the complex workings of the industry.

When the effect of the protective tariff is brought down to specific cases we have revealed facts which are alarming to any business man. Importations of that type of commodity produced in the manufacturing regions of the United States are already increasing. In the manufacture of cotton, the manufacturer is forced to add to his cost of production increased pay rolls as a result of code regulations and trade practices; he is forced to curtail his output of goods and at the same time to pay higher taxes and heavier prices for raw materials. Each of these factors is mounting rapidly, and we cannot expect to continue to build up the prices of domestic commodities if we are to compete with foreign countries.

With these facts in mind, I do not see how we can expect early industrial recovery, if we insist upon passing measures like the pending bill.

KING HILL IRRIGATION DISTRICT

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3151, to cancel certain Government liens on lands within the King Hill irrigation district, State of Idaho. I spoke to the majority leader about the bill this morning. I think there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3151) to cancel certain Government liens on lands within the King Hill irrigation distrct, State of Idaho, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into a contract with the King Hill irrigation district, organized under the laws of the State of Idaho, by which said district and the United States shall rescind the agreements between them of March 2, 1926, November 14, 1923, January 11, 1922, June 17, 1920, and December 17, 1917, each party in such rescissory agreement to release the other from all obligations, accrued or to accrue, under the said five agreements, and the United States as a part of said rescissory agreement to quitclaim to the said district all the right, title, interest and estate of the United States in or to said King Hill reclamation project, including the water rights thereof and any real estate acquired or held by the United States in connection therewith.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to enter into an explanation of the bill, further than to say that the measure as it is now on the calendar was drawn in the Interior Department, and has the approval of that Department. It also has the approval of the Reclamation Bureau and the Budget Director. It provides for the cancelation of certain claims on a project in Idaho, the Government having concluded that it does not desire to proceed any further in the construction of the project.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to convey to the King Hill irrigation district, State of Idaho, all the interest of the United States in the King Hill Federal reclamation project, and for other purposes."

VEHICLES FOR HIRE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement with respect to a bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

As Senators are aware, recently there has been considerable criticism growing out of the fact that there have been numerous accidents as the result of the alleged negligence of taxicab drivers. In some instances, there is no provision for obtaining compensation, as many of them are not financially responsible and do not carry insurance. The matter was inquired into very carefully in the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, and a bill was unanimously reported providing for the carrying of insurance by those having licenses as public carriers within the District.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3032, the measure to which I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the bill involve taxicab bonds?

Mr. KING. It requires of operators and owners that they obtain the usual insurance to operate taxicabs.

Mr. McNARY. Did the committee hold hearings?

Mr. KING. A subcommittee was appointed, and I understand that hearings were held on the subject, and that the question was fully considered.

Mr. McNARY. And the committee unanimously reported the bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah for the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3032) to require financial responsibility of owners and operators of vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the word "require", to strike out "any and all corporations, companies, associations, joint-stock companies, or associations, partnerships, and persons, their lessees, trustees, or receivers, appointed by any court whatsoever", and insert "all owners"; on page 2, line 5, after the word "insurance", to strike out "in a solvent and responsible surety or insurance company authorized to do business in the District of Columbia"; in line 8, after the word "payment", to strike out "to any person"; in line 9, after the word "such", to strike out "corporations, companies, associations, joint-stock companies or associations, partnerships, and persons, their lessees, trustees, or receivers, appointed by any court whatsoever, or renters of their cabs" and insert "owner or his agent, lessee, employee, or renter"; in line 14, before the word "to", to strike out "injury" and insert "damage"; in line 16, after the word "such", to strike out "motor cabs or other vehicles" and insert "vehicle"; in line 18, after the word "terms", to insert "and/"; in line 19, after the word "the", to strike out "Commission" and insert "Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia"; on page 3, line 4, after the word "respective", to strike out "judgments. SEC. 3. If, after the issuance of a certificate, it shall appear to the said superintendent that any company or companies are no longer trustworthy or financially capable of meeting their obligations, he shall withdraw from the Public Utilities Commission the certificate theretofore issued by him, and in such event the company or companies shall immediately cease to write any further bond or bonds or policy or policies of insurance under this act.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect and be in force 60 days from and after the passage and approval of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia is hereby directed to require all owners operating, controlling, managing, or renting any passenger motor vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia, except as to operations licensed under paragraph 31 (b) of the act approved July 1, 1932, known as the "license act", and except such common carriers as have been expressly exempted from the jurisdiction of the Commission, to file with the Commission for each motor vehicle to be operated a bond or bonds, policy or policies, of liability insurance conditioned for the payment of any judgment recovered against such owner or his agent, lessee, employee, or renter, for death or for injury to any person or damage to any property, or both, caused in the operation, maintenance, use, or by reason of the defective construction of such vehicle. Any such bond or undertaking or policy of liability insurance shall be in such form and on such terms and/or conditions as the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia may direct: Provided, That such bond or policy may limit the liability of the surety or insurer on any one judgment to $2,500 for bodily injuries or death and $500 for damage to or destruction of property, and all judgments recovered upon claims arising out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action to $5,000 for bodily injuries or death and $1,000 for damages to or destruction of property, to be apportioned ratably among the judgment creditors according to the amount of their respective judgments: Provided, however, That such bond or bonds, or policy or policies, of insurance shall contain a provision for a continuing liability thereunder notwithstanding any recovery thereon.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect and be in force 60 days from and after the passage and approval of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, without making a full explanation of the measure, I ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks several paragraphs of the report which was submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], who was chairman of the subcommittee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to require all owners operating, controlling, managing, or renting any passenger motor vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia to file with the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia for each motor vehicle a bond or policy of liability insurance conditioned for the payment of any judgment recovered against such owner for death or for injury to any person or damage to property caused in the operation of such vehicle. Under the present law there is no requirement in the District of Columbia which protects the public from the negligent or careless operation of public vehicles for hire. The enactment of this legislation will eliminate from the public streets many cab owners and operators who are not financially responsible and are judgment-proof. The legislation will likewise prevent many persons from entering the public-utility field who are unreliable and financially unable to meet the demands made upon them in cases where judgments are rendered by the courts.

The bill requires that the owner or operator file with the Public Utilities Commission a bond or policy of liability insurance, but limits the liability of the insurance company or surety on the bond to $2,500 for bodily injuries or death and $500 for damage to property, with the further provision that such bond or insurance policy shall contain a provision for a continuing liability notwithstanding any recovery thereon. The bill further provides that the superintendent of insurance of the District of Columbia shall pass upon the bonds or policies of insurance and shall certify to the Public Utilities Commission that the company or companies issuing the bonds or insurance policies are responsible. The bill provides for a penalty for the operation of any motor vehicle for hire without complying with the provisions of the bill.

Approval has been given to the bill by many civic and other organizations of the District of Columbia, namely, the Federation of Citizens' Associations, the Washington Board of Trade, the Washington Chamber of Commerce, and others, as well as by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, the Insurance Department, the Corporation Counsel, and the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The above organizations and bodies, as well as numerous others, endorse and recommend the passage of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Louisiana desire to speak on the bill tonight?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from Oregon know of any Senator who does wish to speak at this time?

Mr. MCNARY. Not this evening. We shall have one or two speakers tomorrow.

RECESS

Mr. HARRISON. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. MCNARY. Will not the Senator make that 12 o'clock tomorrow, in view of the fact that there are to be some important committee meetings and conferences?

Mr. HARRISON. Very well, Mr. President. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 22, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 21, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, our Heavenly Father, help us this day to fulfill the duties of our station; to bear any annoyances or trivial irritations; to put kindly construction on unkindly acts; to give of our best to the least; to love even the ungrateful. Enable us to do these things not for the praise of man but for the extension of Thy kingdom in human hearts and homes and for the sake of our Savior, whom we love, and all praise and glory be unto Thee forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, May 17, 1934, and Sunday, May 20, 1934, was read and approved.

Very respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House of Representatives Hon. JARED Y. SANDERS, Jr., Member-elect from the Sixth Louisiana District, and I request that the oath be administered.

Mr. SANDERS appeared in the well of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

CORRECTION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following concurrent resolution from the Senate:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 17

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3355) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, to correct an error thereon.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD LAWS FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 7306) to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right-of-way for railroads in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved May 14, 1898, as amended, with a Senate amendment and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out lines 1 to 20, inclusive, and insert "Provided further, That any citizen of the United States, after occupying land of the character described as a homestead or headquarters, in a habitable house, not less than 5 months each year for 3 years, may purchase such tract, not exceeding 5 acres, in a reasonable compact form, without any showing as to his employment or business, upon payment of $2.50 per acre, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and in such cases surveys may be made without expense to the applicants in like manner as the survey of settlement claims under the act of June 28, 1918 (40 Stat. 632), as amended by section 1 of the act of April 13, 1926 (44 Stat. 243): And provided further, That the minimum payment for any such tract shall be $10, and no person shall be permitted to purchase more than one tract except upon a showing of good faith and necessity satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may be permitted to sit this afternoon during the session of the House.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the purpose of this meeting is to report a bill that would be a substitute bill for the McLeod bill. Will the distinguished chairman of the committee give us some information as to whether that is so.

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot say to the gentleman what action the Committee on Banking and Currency will take this afternoon. I may say to the gentleman that legislation in which he is interested is under consideration by the committee along with other measures, but I cannot anticipate the action of the committee or give assurances as to what will be done. I am not in position to say. That will be for the committee to decide.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. TRUAX. I withhold my objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I know the gentleman's views on this legislation, and the gentleman and other Members are acquainted with my views on the subject. I am a member of the committee, and I have gone over this matter very carefully with the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency and with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. TRUAX. Has the gentleman consulted the author of the McLeod bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have, and I may say to the gentleman that this bill now under consideration by the Banking and Currency Committee can be made a good bill. I am convinced that we should get together with the administration in an attempt to get relief for the depositors in these closed banks. The gentleman and I have talked this over. I have talked the matter over with Mr. MCLEOD, and, although I cannot speak for him, I can say that we are heartily in favor of any legislation which will give relief to the depositors in closed banks. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, may I make a statement to the gentleman? Surely the gentleman is not going to object to the committee sitting this afternoon to consider matters now pending before that committee.

Mr. TRUAX. I am not convinced that is the purpose of the meeting.

Mr. BYRNS. There is no other purpose in the world. The members of the committee desire to meet, and they are certainly entitled to meet, and I am sure the gentleman is not going to object to the members of the committee having a meeting this afternoon when the only object they have is the perfection of the bill referred to.

Mr. STEAGALL. I have stated to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] the business before the committee. I cannot, of course, disclose to the gentleman things transpiring in executive meetings of the committee, and I cannot undertake to commit the committee to any action in advance. I can only make this request in order to expedite the business of the session.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency and his colleagues have at last decided to take some action, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]?

There was no objection.

STATUES OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AND ROBERT E. LEE

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the proceedings had in the rotunda of the Capitol on Friday night at the ceremonies in connection with the acceptance of the statues of Washington and Lee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to here record in the permanent archives of the Government a brief description of the ceremonies and the addresses delivered in the rotunda of the Capitol on the evening of May 18, 1934. The occasion was ceremonies under the auspices of the Virginia delegation in Congress officially accepting, on behalf of the Government, the statues of George Washington and Robert E. Lee, which many years ago had been presented to the Government and placed in Statuary Hall.

As a matter of historic interest, I should like to recall briefly that about 30 years ago the State of Virginia, through a committee from the Senate and House of Delegates from Virginia, procured and presented to the Government these two statues. The commission representing the State at that time was as follows:

From Senate of Virginia: Hon. H. T. Wickham, of Hanover; Hon. J. N. Opie, of Staunton; Hon. Thos. D. Gold, of Berryville; Hon. Edward Lyle, of Roanoke; Hon. Don P. Halsey, of Lynchburg.

From House of Delegates of Virginia: Hon. Richard B. Davis, of Petersburg; Hon. J. C. Featherston, of Campbell County; Hon. Geo. E. Sipe, of Harrisonburg; Hon. H. C. Rice, of Charlotte County; Hon. J. C. Gent, of Lebanon.

Of the above commission, only three members are still alive, to wit, Hon. H. T. Wickham, of Hanover; Hon. Don P. Halsey, of Lynchburg; and Hon. George E. Sipe, of Harrisonburg.

The statues were placed in Statuary Hall, but were never officially accepted by the usual procedure of the passage of a resolution of acceptance. When I came to Congress, I learned somewhat accidentally that Virginia's contribution to the Hall of Fame had never been officially accepted by the Government. I found upon inquiry that the reason assigned was that some objection had been made to the acceptance of the statue of Lee because he wore a Confederate uniform. After considerable discussion among my colleagues, I was led to believe that if there had been such feeling in other years, it had entirely passed away. On February 22, 1932, the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, I introduced in the House of Representatives the following resolution:

House Concurrent Resolution 24

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of this Congress be presented to the Governor and through him to the people of the State of Virginia for the statues of George Washington and Robert E. Lee, whose names are so honorably identified with the history of our country; that these works of art are accepted in the name of the Nation and assigned to places in the old Hall of Representatives already set aside by Congress for the statues of eminent citizens; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the Governor of Virginia.

This resolution was duly reported out by the House Committee on the Library and placed upon the calendar. The first time it was called for consideration some objection was raised by one Member of the House, but on the second calling of the resolution it was passed by the House as originally drawn. This resolution was concurred in by the Senate.

The ceremony in the rotunda of the Capitol on the evening of May 18 was the official acceptance of these statues and was under the auspices of the Virginia congressional delegation all of whom were present and who are as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION FROM VIRGINIA

Senators: CARTER GLASS and HARRY FLOOD BYRD.

Representatives (at large): CLIFTON A. WOODRUM, ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, THOMAS G. BURCH, HOWARD W. SMITH, PATRICK H. DREWRY, COLGATE W. DARDEN, JR., JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, and A. WILLIS ROBERTSON.

Through the kind offices of the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. David Lynn, and his genial and efficient assistant, Mr. Arthur E. Cook, supervising engineer, very ample and sufficient arrangements were made for this ceremony. An audience of approximately 650 people, composed of distinguished citizens of Virginia and other States, Federal and State officials, Members of the House of Representatives and Senate from other States, and many visiting dignitaries of patriotic and fraternal organizations was present. The Marine Band orchestra furnished music. Appropriate floral decorations were furnished by the Department of Agriculture and the Botanic Garden, and the young ladies who are sponsors for the several congressional districts in the Virginia Society of the District of Columbia served as ushers. Preceding the formal ceremony an informal reception was held in Statuary Hall.

The program in the rotunda of the Capitol was introduced by our distinguished and beloved senior Senator from Virginia, Hon. CARTER GLASS. In opening the ceremony Senator GLASS said:

We come not to pay tribute to George Washington and Robert E. Lee, but to perform belated formalities in doing honor to Statuary Hall.

The presentation of the statues was by Gov. George C. Peery, of Virginia, who spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Senator WALSH, fellow Virginians, ladies, and gentlemen, the Congress of the United States, by a resolution passed in 1864, designated the old assembly hall of the lower House as "National Statuary Hall." The resolution of Congress authorized the President to "invite all the States to provide and furnish statues in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military services such as each State may deem to be worthy of this national commemoration."

The purpose to be accomplished met with hearty accord. The practical execution thereof met with some difficulty. The number of illustrious persons to be commemorated was limited to two from each State. This limitation of selection engendered differences of opinion in some States, resulting in delay in accepting the invitation of the President. In other instances doubt arose, following the animosities of war, as to whether the selection of some of the heroes of the South would be graciously received and approved by the Nation. Happily, in later years this feeling has been forgotten and the States, in response to the resolution, have from time to time made selections and sent statues of their heroic dead to take their place in the Nation's Hall of Fame.

It is difficult to appraise accurately the elements of greatness in persons whose character, virtues, and achievements widely differ. Perhaps it is well that the selections have not been limited to any one class or profession and that they have taken a wide range among those eminent in the several walks of life.

And so to this pantheon of fame have come the statues in marble or bronze of many of the Nation's great. "Where pilgrims from all parts of the Union, as well as from foreign lands, may come and behold * * * the actual form and mold of those who have inerasably fixed their names on the pages of history."

In this galaxy of the Nation's renowned, here and there, we find the figures of one whose fame rests upon military achievement. We see another who has won distinction by patriotic service and exalted leadership. From one State comes the statue of a great inventor. Another sends the kindly image of a French missionary, whose faithful work among the Indians, coupled with his daring and achievement as an explorer, entitled him to receive this chaplet of distinction.

From the Lone Star State came the marble likeness of a man in frontier garb, who was born in Virginia, later became Governor of Tennessee, and still later emigrated to Texas and became Governor and Senator from that great State.

Another State placed one of her crowns of distinction upon one of Indian blood, who invented an alphabet for the people of the Cherokee race.

From one of our Southern States came the statue of a beloved physician, who discovered sulphuric ether as an anæsthetic in surgery, and who declared that his profession was to him a "ministry from God."

To the State of Illinois belongs the distinction of contributing the first statue of an illustrious woman. She contributed the statue of Frances E. Willard.

After years had softened the feeling that arose from civil strife there came from two of the States of the South the likeness of the President and Vice President of the Confederacy, so that the devotees of a lost cause might look with reverent affection upon the image of these heroes of the South.

For Virginia, the duty of selecting two of her most illustrious sons has not been a difficult task. Upon her roster are the names of many distinguished men whose statues might well merit places beside the illustrious dead from other States. There are Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Marshall, Mason, Henry, Jackson, Wilson, and a host of others whose fame rests upon no insecure foundation and each of whom might well be awarded a place in the Nation's Hall of Fame.

But a review of the roster brings us unerringly back to two who stand out in bold relief as the Commonwealth's most illustrious men. And those men are Washington, the Father of our Country, and Lee, the matchless leader of the lost cause.

In presenting the statue of Washington to the Nation, Virginia feels that she has set the chief star in the Nation's Hall of Fame. No galaxy of illustrious American leaders would be complete that did not include Washington. His statue alone would suffice to illumine any chamber in which are gathered the immortals of the Nation. Virginia gave him birth. She reared him. She loved him. In Virginia he made his home. And now Virginia guards his grave. And while he is still the child and son of the Old Dominion, yet the Commonwealth recognizes that he is the Father of the Republic and that our glory is the glory of the Nation.

Neither do we stop there, for in truth the glory of our Nation in Washington is shared by the free people of all the earth.

We read in Holy Writ that "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars—for one star differeth from another star in glory." This is true of the illustrious dead whose statues have been awarded a place in the Nation's Hall of Fame, but methinks that if these silent figures could be touched to life, they would all bow in common obeisance to the glory of Washington.

Our National Capital bears his name. Here in this beautiful city where all may see, a lofty monument, built by a grateful people to his memory, points to heaven. And hary-by, at historic Mount Vernon, in his native Virginia, his mortal remains rest in dreamless sleep. Virginia and the Nation acclaim him as a pioneer in freedom.

"First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The other upon whom Virginia places her signal mark of distinction is a man who has been described as "One of the most striking, one of the noblest tragic figures the world has ever produced." This man is the beloved Lee. Virginia gave him birth, and now points to many shrines which bespeak his life and character. We wander through the halls at Stratford and muse with ourselves upon the surroundings that helped to mold his character in infancy and early boyhood. We follow him to school in Alexandria and on to West Point, where he became a model student and graduated high in his class. We read with interest and delight of the romance of his life, culminating in his marriage to Mary Custis at Arlington in June 1831, of the happy married life that followed and of the splendid sons and daughters who were born of the marriage. We follow him in his career back to West Point, where he became superintendent of the Military Academy in 1852, and then years later returned to the Army and continued in the military service of the Nation until the tragic days of civil war arose.

Then came the time for making the most momentous decision of his life. It was marked by no vacillation or weakness. It was devoid of personal interest. It was glorified by unselfishness, and eloquently bespoke the nobility and greatness of the man. His decision was that he could not take up arms against his native State.

We go with him through that tragic struggle to Bull Run, Sharpsburg, Chancellorsville, and many other battlefields, and finally to Gettysburg and to the travail and sorrow that came with the fall of the curtain at Appomattox.

Lee's greatness was the greatness that withstood defeat. Too often is the world's standard of greatness measured by success. Washington was great, but he was successful; Lincoln was great, but he, too, was successful. Grant was a great soldier, but he drank of the joy of victory. But Lee was great in defeat.

In the combination of the traits that go to make up true nobility and greatness, Lee, among the men of his day and generation, stood out like the giant mountain peak that rears its lofty head far above its stately fellows and stands out with a distinctive glory and grandeur.

Among the tributes to Lee, I mention but two.

The late Theodore Roosevelt said of him:

"Lee will undoubtedly rank as without any exception the greatest of all the great captains that the English-speaking people have brought forth—and this, although the last and chief of his antagonists may claim to stand as the full equal of Marlborough and Wellington."

Lord Wolseley said of him:

"He was the ablest general and to me seemed the greatest man I had ever conversed with."

Virginia presents to the Nation the statues of these two men—the choicest spirits of her illustrious sons.

Upon one are the words "Washington—Virginia", and upon the other, "Lee—Virginia"—only two words of inscription upon each! But what a wealth of meaning in those words! What a reminder of a glorious past, and what an inspiration for what we steadfastly hope will be a more glorious future!

The acceptance of the statues was by Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, whose address follows:

It is a high privilege to participate here in the ceremonies attending the formal consecration in the Hall of Fame of these statues of two of America's immortals, which is, indeed, a hall of exalted associations, long the meeting place of our House of Representatives in the early days of our Republic. Originally a place of statutes, it is now a place of statues—of many illustrious men who contributed to the establishment and the advancement of our Nation.

All those who are enshrined here in sculptured marble and bronze have claim to fame. But the two of her native sons whom Virginia has proudly selected for inclusion in the noble array of soldiers and statesmen are of the heroic figures of the ages whose names and whose fame are imperishable—George Washington and Robert E. Lee.

It is not my purpose on this occasion to undertake any eulogy of either of these heroic figures. Their lives and their deeds have been recounted and extolled times without number. Yet with such men as these our tributes and the world's tributes will never cease. But other speakers will deliver the eulogies appropriate to this occasion.

I am here not in any personal capacity but rather as the delegate of the Congress to accept on its behalf Virginia's gift to the Hall of Fame which Congress established. Moreover, much as I appreciate the privilege and honor thus conferred upon me, I realize that it is not to me personally but rather to my native State—Massachusetts.

It seems to me to be peculiarly fitting and appropriate that it has devolved upon a representative of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to respond on behalf of all of the 48 States to this presentation of Washington and Lee from the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Massachusetts and Virginia were the earliest British colonies in the New World, and from the earliest days to the present time their histories have had many parallels.

Virginia and Massachusetts stood shoulder to shoulder in the battles of the Revolutionary War. They collaborated in the Declaration of Independence, and both figured prominently in the proceedings of the constitutional convention.

It was John Adams of Massachusetts who proposed George Washington for Commander in Chief of the Army, and it was Adams who was our first Vice President and who succeeded Washington as President. And it was Adams who appointed the great John Marshall of Virginia Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

When we turn to the Civil War we find Massachusetts and Virginia on opposite sides, but, as in the past, each was in the forefront. Massachusetts was in the lead in the demand for the abolition of slavery. Massachusetts contributed heavily in men and in money to the support of the Union forces. Virginia gave the South, General Lee, and the capital of the Confederacy was established at Richmond.

The animosities engendered by the Civil War have long since been obliterated. The Mason and Dixon's line is no longer even a figure of speech. Much more than that is the fact that as time marches on the pioneer States which share a common ancestry and similar histories tend more than ever to a common consciousness and community of interest and of spirit. Whatever the spirit of sectionalism, if there be any such spirit today, it does not exist between Massachusetts Bay and Jamestown.

Furthermore, it seems to me that the acceptance here by the Nation of Virginia's gift of a statue of Gen. Robert E. Lee is in the nature of a final attestation of the entire extinguishment of the passions which once divided our country and set brother against brother, and which lingered long after all arms had been laid down.

We demonstrate here that the terms "friend and foe" no longer have any application to our own countrymen. Many statues have been erected to the brave and noble leader of the armies of the Confederacy, but the placing of a statue of Lee alongside of Washington in the national hall of fame beneath the Capitol dome, is epochal.

We now unite in proclaiming Lee a national hero. And again I advert to the happy circumstance that it is a successor to Charles Sumner in the Senate of the United States from Massachusetts, who stands here to give official expression to this sentiment on behalf of Congress, and, may I be permitted to add, on behalf of the Nation.

Virginia has many illustrious sons from whom to choose in determining which two should be accorded the particular honor or statues in Statuary Hall—Washington, Jefferson, Marshall, Madison, and Lee—to name only a few. The Virginia roll of honor is a long one. The selection of Washington, of whom alone it has been said so often and so well that he was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen", was, of course, obvious and very nearly inevitable. The selection of Gen. Robert E. Lee rather than Jefferson or Marshall or Madison to stand beside Washington in this Hall might not at first glance look to be so obvious a choice. But upon reflection, we cannot fail to be deeply impressed by the qualities of greatness which Washington and Lee had in common and which make them particularly fitting companions in this gallery of heroes.

It is much more than the fact that they were both natives of the same State and that their dispositions were shaped by the influences of the same physical surrounding, the same social life, and the same general ancestry. Earnest, sedate, and studious, even in boyhood, both early assumed the duties of manhood. A commanding presence and an equally commanding personal dignity were common to both from their youth to their last hours. Both were remarkable for a combination of moral and intellectual qualities so evenly balanced and so exquisitely proportioned that no one quality overshadowed or dwarfed another. Equally characteristic of both were their perfect integrity and probity in every relation and every situation of their lives.

Both proved themselves of the greatest military genius the world has ever known. And, finally, both were endowed with those supreme gifts of mind and of soul which raise up one man among millions to be a historical leader of men.

It is the singular felicity of the Commonwealth of Virginia to produce two such stainless captains.

To Washington and to Lee, all honor and glory, now and forevermore!

The addresses of Governor Peery and Senator Walsh were broadcast over the Dixie network by the Columbia Broadcasting Co.

Judge Don P. Halsey, of Lynchburg, Va., a distinguished Virginian, who was secretary of the Virginia commission which presented the statues to the Government, made the following address:

VIRGINIA'S SONS IN STATUARY HALL

As the secretary of the commission which had the matter in charge, I think it may be of interest if I give a brief historical summary of how, why, and when, the statues of George Washington and Robert Edward Lee were placed in Statuary Hall, formerly the Hall of the House of Representatives, here in the National Capitol of the United States.

As you all probably know, this Hall was set apart by Congress as a shrine of patriotism, where each State of the Union is given the privilege of placing the statues of two of its illustrious dead, such as "each State shall determine to be worthy of this national commemoration."

Some 30 years ago, when I was a young member of the Virginia State Senate, the thought occurred to me, that, of all Virginia's great sons, the two most "worthy of this national commemoration" were Gen. George Washington and Gen. Robert Edward Lee. Accordingly, I introduced and secured the passage of the necessary enactments, which provided that the Houdon statue of Washington should be copied in bronze, and that a companion statue of Lee should be made by Mr. Edward V. Valentine, the great Virginia sculptor, who had made the famous recumbent statue of Lee which marks his tomb in Lexington. A commission was created with authority to cause these statues to be made and placed in Statuary Hall, which was composed of the following members: Hons. H. T. Wickham, J. N. Opie, Thomas D. Gold, Edward Lyle, and myself, on the part of the senate, and Hons. Richard B. Davis, J. C. Featherston, George E. Sipe, H. C. Rice, and J. C. Gent, on the part of the house of delegates. The Honorable Claude A. Swanson, then Governor of Virginia, was a member ex officio, and, when present, acted as chairman. The regularly elected chairman was Hon. Richard B. Davis, of Petersburg, and the secretary of the commission was your present speaker. After the death of Senator Opie, Judge George L. Christian, of Richmond, was chosen to fill the vacancy.

The statue of Lee having been completed in handsome style by Mr. Valentine, both this statue and the copy of the Houdon statue of Washington were cast in bronze at the foundry of the Gorham Manufacturing Co., in Providence, R.I., and during the summer of 1909 were transported to Washington and duly erected upon suitable pedestals in Statuary Hall, where they have since remained.

In choosing Washington to be thus honored there could be no difference of opinion, for not only Virginia but all America with unanimous acclaim hold him supreme and unrivaled, alone in his imperial grandeur, deserving above all others the immortal tribute of Gen. Henry Lee, as "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." And if Virginia had desired to select his companion in this hall of fame from among his contemporaries, so many there were deserving of the honor that their number constituted an embarrassment of riches—Henry, Madison, Monroe, Jefferson, Mason, Wythe, Marshall, and many others fully measured up to the highest standard of greatness, and would have reflected honor upon their State and Nation, and have been found worthy to stand in this great company of America's noblest and best. But having selected Washington for our representative of the Revolutionary time, it seemed fitting to take the other from a later time, and that the most stirring period of the Nation's history, and with this in view, surely none could be found more truly worthy of the honor than the stainless chieftain, Robert Edward Lee.

In presenting the measures providing that the statue of Lee should accompany that of Washington in our national Valhalla, I did so from no desire to offend northern sentiment, although the wounds of the War between the States were then not wholly healed, but rather from entirely opposite motives. I believed then, and time has proved that I was right in believing, that such a gesture by Virginia would be, as it was intended to be, of great moment toward strengthening the ties that now bind together the once divided North and South into one great reunited country in which sectionalism is dead and buried, and reunion and reconciliation have taken its place, with "the wounds of war healed in every heart and on every hill." I believed then, as I know now, that for Virginia thus to exercise her legal right to make her own choice in this matter would enhance, rather than diminish the love and respect in which she is held by all her sister States, and that every star in the constellation of the Union would twinkle with delight when Virginia gave the statues of her Washington and her Lee to the Nation she helped to make, and which, as time has proved, she stands forever ready to defend.

I believe then, and I know now, that Virginia and the South had all to gain and nothing to lose by thus sending Lee as well as Washington to stand in America's Capitol, for, as time again has proved to be true, I felt that the more the character of Lee was discussed, the more it would stand out as similar to that of Washington, and the more would the world be brought to a realization and an appreciation of his greatness and the righteousness of the cause for which he fought, and I am content with the result. In the beautiful and felicitous language of the gifted and lamented James Lindsay Gordon, I knew that "of the long list of glorious names which America has furnished to the history of the world, it was our mother's fortune to furnish the two that lead that mighty band—the two characters that tower in complete and rounded stature over all their great compatriots, the Castor and Pollux of our Nation's history, the 'Great Twin Brethren', who will ride down the centuries leading the vanguard of our army of immortality—chiefs of the deathless host of patriots, soldiers, philosophers, and statesmen, who put life to heroic uses and battled for noble ends, the two of this continent incomparable and unrivaled—George Washington and Robert E. Lee."

Both of them were "rebels." If one is to be condemned for it, the other must be also, for there is no difference between them except that the rebellion in which Washington figured was successful, while that led by Lee was not. Both of them had held commissions under the governments which they afterward opposed. Washington won against the King under whose flag he had served, while Lee lost against the country whose battles he had fought. Each went with his State, when the time came, when the choice had to be made, and the parallel between them is complete except that one was victorious and the other was vanquished.

If Washington had been living in 1861, and had been confronted with the same choice that Lee had to make, I have no doubt that he would have done the same as Lee did, and that is among the reasons why I wanted to see them together in Statuary Hall—because there are no two great characters in history so much alike as Washington and Lee, and because I wanted the world to know that Virginia gives to these two noblest and best beloved of all her sons equal honor and equal reverence.

In a notable speech on Robert E. Lee, which he said was inspired by the action of the Virginia Legislature in declaring the purpose to present his statue to be placed in Statuary Hall, Judge Emory Speer, a distinguished and eloquent Georgian, said:

"Deny Lee a place by Washington! Ah, is it sure, if in the awful hour when the invading columns approached Virginia's soil, the winds of the Prophet had breathed upon the slain that they might live, caught from the wall at Mount Vernon by the reincarnated hand of the Father of his Country, the defensive blade of Washington would not have gleamed beside the sword of Lee? Repel them not, my country, the fervid love of thy sons who fought with Lee, and of the children of their loins. Their prowess thou hast seen on the hills of Santiago, on the waters of Luzon. In thy need the children of Grant have been and are brethren in arms of the kinsmen of Lee. Officers of his, thou hast called to thy service in the highest places in peace and war. His comrades and his kinsman wear thy swords. With joy his sword, too, leaped at thy command. The flowers of spring with equal hand thou wilt henceforth strew on graves of all the dead. Why, then, repel his blameless name from thy immortals' scroll? Then honor him and in thy need on those who love him wilt thou not call in vain. And woe to the foe in press of battle when the soul of Lee shall fire their hearts and his bright sword shall point the charging columns of thy sons."

Not only at Santiago and Luzon, but since those words were spoken, the sons of those who followed Lee and Grant have fought and died together on the fair fields of France in the cause of liberty and right, and though the eloquent tongue of Speer is silent now, in death, his patriotic and prophetic spirit inspires us here tonight with a love that embraces every foot of American soil, every State in the Union.

It is not, therefore, in any spirit of sectional prejudice or bitterness that Virginia gives these statues, but rather in the spirit of those noble words uttered by the late President Theodore Roosevelt over 30 years ago:

"We are now a united people; the wounds left by the great Civil War, incomparably the greatest war of modern times, have healed, and its memories are now priceless heritages of honor, alike to the North and to the South. The devotion, the self-sacrifice, the steadfast resolution and lofty daring, the high devotion to the right as each man saw it, whether northerner or southerner, all these qualities of the men and women of the early sixties, now shine luminous and brilliant before your eyes, while the mist of anger and hatred that once dimmed them have passed away forever. All of us, North and South, can glory alike in the valor of the men who wore the blue, and the men who wore the gray."

Mr. Roosevelt also wrote such high praise of Lee, as a soldier, that none of his own followers could say more.

In his life of Thomas H. Benton, in the American Statesman Series, on page 34, are found these words:

"The world has never seen better soldiers than those who followed Lee, and their leader will undoubtedly rank as without any exception the very greatest of all the great captains that the English-speaking peoples have brought forth, and this although the last and chief of his antagonists may himself claim to stand as the full equal of Marlborough and Wellington."

It is, then, with the greatest pride and gratification that Virginia today, with a heart full of love and gratitude, acknowledges the thanks that the Congress has bestowed upon her for presenting these statues of her greatest sons. For nearly a quarter of a century they have stood in this Capitol, by right of law but until now without the thanks of Congress and ceremony of dedication. Never, however, has Virginia doubted that this day would come, and now that it has and her sister States join with her in thus paying tribute and homage to her great sons, she extends to them one and all her heartfelt appreciation and loving regard, feeling more fully at one with them and the "Union strong and great" than she has ever felt before.

The true significance of Virginia's selection of Washington and Lee as her representatives in Statuary Hall is found in those words of Thomas Carlyle: "Who is to have a statue? means whom shall we consecrate and set apart as one of our sacred men, * * *. Show me that man you honor; I know by that symptom better than any other what kind of a man you yourself are, for you show me there what your ideal of manhood is; what kind of a man you long inexpressibly to be, and would thank the gods, with your whole soul, for being if you could." It is because Washington and Lee are still Virginia's ideal men that she today dedicates and consecrates these statues to their memory and thereby declares that by their example and their teachings she hopes forever to abide. In honoring them, Virginians honor themselves, and show to the world the kind of men and women we would be if we could. And if we cannot honor them more, it is only because—

"Far above us and all our love, beyond all reach of its voiceless praise,
Shine forever the names that never shall feel the shade of the changeful days
Fall and chill the delight, that still sees winter's light in it shine like May's.

"Strong as death is the day's dark breath whose blast has withered the life we see,
Here where light is the child of night, and less than visions or dreams are we;
Strong as death; but a word, a breath, a dream is stronger than death could be.
"Strong as truth, and superb in youth eternal,
Fair as the sundawn's flame,
Seen when May, on her first born day, bids earth exult in her radiant name, Lives, clothed around with our love, and crowned with praise that dies not, their lovelit fame."

Dr. Francis P. Gaines, president of Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Va., closed the program with the following eloquent tribute to Washington and Lee:

It may be the despair of historians, but it is a fact of human experience that the deeds of men, like the low features of a swiftly retreating landscape, become quickly confused and indistinguishable, while the characters of important men rise slowly with enhanced vividness, the hilltops of our observation. In the case of men, moreover, about whom epochs revolve, these characters may become merged with ideals or transmuted into them; and then the personages are the mountain peaks, open to long stretches of vision, inevitable in snow-capped loftiness against the horizon. Upon such a vista does this program focus, upon twin mountain majesties of worth—if we may modify a Byronic phrase, upon Washington and Lee.

Not from surface manifestations could we classify these men as twins. The apparent variation between their careers is almost as wide as the range of human fortune.

It was ordained that both of these men should lead an effort to smash a formal political pattern.

It was ordained that one of them should succeed and that having broken to bits that ancient pattern he should become chief artisan in a new design that excited the wonder of the world, and remains, we fondly believe, the image of its hope. Honor and glory were his; cities and States and nations did him homage; and his name was set upon the chronicles of time in the luster of victory.

It was ordained that the other man should fail. For a long time the throngs that follow the tribal god, success, passed this man by and he was marooned in a kind of forlornness, accepted at best as the perfect type of gracefulness in defeat. But his people loved him always, even when not quite comprehending him, loved him as no mere mortal was ever loved by his own. Some drew near and became acquainted with him; and all who learned to know him found a refreshing of life, as weary pilgrims come into the shadow of a great tree; never again the hot rays of bitterness to scorch the tissues of their souls, never again the dreary desert stretches of despair to daunt their spirits.

Tonight we demonstrate that even as these men could "Meet with triumph and disaster

And treat those two imposters just the same", so can we in our appraisal. The outcome of their effort is of little significance. Issues have been acknowledged, factionalisms have been forgotten. Even the warfare into which these men entered is not the chief item in our thinking of them; the spilling of blood, in which they had reluctant part, was a gesture of our development, unnecessary but perhaps with such compensations as Whitman indicates:

"That the hands of the sisters, Death and Night, Incessantly softly wash again, and yet again, this soiled world."

The deeds of these men are not of primary consequence, as the landscape of the years retreats from us. But upon the horizon remain the everlasting granite of their characters, the shining eminence of their ideals, the twin mountain majesties of worth.

For though these men lived in different centuries, exalted with heroic effort different flags, entered into widely divergent consequence, there is about them some basic identity which of itself would make appropriate their eternal fellowship here.

II

The initial identity gives us caution. Washington and Lee were both spiritual citizens of a kind of incommunicable solitude. They resided in the fastnesses of the primal sanities, and the temper of modern interpretation, seeking headlines in human eccentricity, does not find in them easy material. The rootage of their lives was in profound yet simple motives, below the level of our fluencies, and the fruitage of their lives is not to be packed into glib phrases.

But it is obvious to even hurried and casual scrutiny that these men share a fundamental harmony in that for them character was destiny. In each case this quality was revealed before and during and after the particular crisis of life that challenged.

For each man found himself conspicuously emergent in a crisis that he had little part in precipitating. Neither had concerned himself with the political antecedents of the decisive hour. Neither had so manipulated the issues and the tense emotions as to frame a set-up of circumstances that might give him a sudden supreme opportunity. In both cases the hour sought the man, because his preparation had been in terms of competence, his chief equipment was trustworthiness. With the spotlights of doom playing upon the stage, each man quietly entered and took the center because of the character that was his.

Both recognized in this crisis not an invitation to self-assertion but a trust committed. As the preparation had been one of character, so was the realization. Whatever statics of action or analyses of strategy be stored in the academic records, the notable facts of their career derive from the quality of their endeavor, from the fortitude, from the energy of devotion, from the keeping of inviolate faith. Gradually both of these men became in themselves the cause they championed. Armies followed them, suffered with them, died before their eyes, because from these two men emanated a strength of character that exalted little lives into surpassing heroism.

Both personages were projected by force of character into immense influence upon events subsequent to the crisis. One of them found beyond the moment of victory an era of national chaos; the other discovered beyond the moment of defeat an era of sectional desolation. By some paradox of history, success for the one and failure for the other meant alike the rebuilding of a society. Each one might well have closed the chapter of his performance, to submit it with confidence into the far-away tribunals of utter justice; such a course was impossible for both by reason of their character. They turned from yesterday unto tomorrow. They penetrated in statesmanlike vision far into the future; they labored for that future; they belong to it.

Beyond all exposition of their performances, beyond the labored eulogies of their distinction, the final interpretation of these men is in terms of the vigor and the beauty of their dream, outrunning the span of their own earthly days.

It is not surprising that both of these men should have had sympathy for an enterprise which is of all human effort most prophetic of brighter tomorrows—education. Washington set increasing reliance upon it; gave to it a growing enthusiasm. As sunset drew near, he was hoping for a dawn bright with learning. In state papers he pleaded for it. He endorsed the idea of West Point, citadel of knowledge for military security; he yearned for a national university in this city, as if to set the governing function and the educative process upon a plane of comparable dignity; he turned a substantial gift which Virginia had made to him unto an educational institution in that State, which gratefully took his name.

Lee dreamed of a great future beyond the desolation of his day, and he too turned to education. Modestly declining manifold proposals that guaranteed economic sufficiency or glory of position, he dedicated his life, as it were, to another epoch of hardship that he might plant harvests for others to reap. He rode his gray horse over Virginia's mountains to the same school Washington had favored, and there he sought to make effective his dream in the perpetual miracle of life, by which in the souls of youth, tenderest of materials, immutable purposes are fixed.

III

Above all other factors that may give fitness to their presence in sculptured likeness here where the heart of the Nation beats, is this quality of forwardness, this survival value of character in the continuity of their dream. The twin mountain peaks are no longer behind us across a landscape which the years make dim. These figures have shifted and are in front of us, always in front of us. They are not ideals which we remember; they are ideals to which we aspire.

Virginia does not make here a contribution to a museum of history. Virginia does not present effigies of biography, however significant. Virginia does not offer specimens of the wealth of personality that has been her endowment, nor memorials of the shining figures of great drama in which she had a share.

Virginia presents here an enduring illumination of the qualities of character which give promise to our life. Here are the symbols of hope, the incarnations of prophecy. Here are the heralds of a

"Golden Age whose light is of the dawn,
And not of sunset, forward, not behind."

To think of these characters is to be conscious not of trivial incidents in a crowded career but of some heritage of nobility which, please God, shall prove inescapable. To look upon these likenesses is to believe that we can yet pay them the adequate tribute of building a Nation which shall be the fulfillment of their dream.

The invocation and benediction were given by the Reverend James Shera Montgomery, Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, the heroic and inspiring figures of Washington and Lee, as they now stand side by side in Statuary Hall, have at last been officially recognized and accepted by the United States Government.

THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—1935

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendments nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15; also further insist upon its amendments to Senate amendments nos. 12 and 16, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I have secured this time in order to make a statement to the House so that the House may decide the policy to pursue on this bill, and the one which will probably hereafter be pursued. I do not think the five members of a conference committee ought to speak for the House on a question that may or may not disturb the cooperative relations between the Senate and the House.

To start with, the legislative bill has been agreed to in conference and the conference report approved by both Houses, except as to a few amendments increasing the salary of certain employees of the Senate. Your conferees did not agree to these amendments and did not recommend an agreement to these amendments for this reason. When we were conducting hearings on the legislative bill, numerous requests came to us to increase the salary of certain employees of the House. Several requests came to us to grant additional employees for the House. We have a rule of the House that prohibits legislation on appropriation bills. We respect and enforce this rule. We did not even consider or conduct hearings on these applications for increases in salaries of employees of the House, neither did we conduct hearings on increasing the number of employees of the House; and in the consideration of the legislative bill on the floor of the House, when an amendment was offered to the bill providing that each Member should have another secretary during these times when we have so much work to do, we made a point of order against the amendment, and it was held not in order.

So the Members of the House have been denied any increase in the number of employees and all requests for increases in salary have been denied.

The bill goes over to the Senate; and while the Senate has a rule that no legislation can be placed on an appropriation bill they put amendments on the bill increasing the number of employees of the Senate, which we agreed to, and increasing the salary of some of the employees of the Senate, which we did not agree to. Two of the salaries were increased $1,500 each.

Your committee did not feel this was the time to increase the salary of employees of either the House or the Senate when we are carrying a reduction in the basic salary of all other employees of the Government. We did not agree to this and had another conference and I have had several individual conferences with Senate conferees.

The Senate is now contending, and this is the point I want the House to decide when the vote comes on the motion of my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], that the number of its employees and the salaries the Senate pays its employees is the business of the Senate and not the business of the House. They say they concede the same right to the House and they further contend that this course of procedure is essential to continued good will between the two Houses. They further insist that never in the history of this Government has the Senate ever attempted to interfere with the number of employees of the House or the salaries paid the employees of the House. They are incorrect in this last mentioned contention.

I want to present both sides of this question and I do not want my opinion or my personality, if it could have any effect, to enter into your decision of this matter, because it marks a change of policy on the part of the House. Heretofore the Senate has insisted very strenuously on the right of a veto power of the action of the House in fixing the salaries of its own employees and the House has just as strenuously insisted on the noninterference of the Senate in such matters.

I read from Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 7241. On March 3, 1881, the House, by a resolution of instructions to its conferees, insisted on its right to determine the compensation of its officers and employees and forced the Senate to recede.

Now listen:

In 1875 a prolonged disagreement occurred between the House and Senate over the Senate amendments to the legislative bill. The Senate insisted on diminishing the amount of compensation of the clerks at the desk of the House, and the House insisted that that was a matter in which the courtesy between the two Houses should leave to the House to fix.

The Senate now claims that they never attempted to interfere with the House fixing the salaries of its own employees, and yet we have here a Senate amendment attempting to reduce the salaries of the clerks at the desk in the House and holding up the bill through four conferences on account thereof.

I continue from Hinds' Precedents:

There were four conferences without an agreement. The fifth conference agreed, and the report was drawn up on the principle as stated by Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, chairman of the House conferees, "That each House shall be entrusted by the other to regulate the number and pay of its own employees."

I am reading this to you in order that you may have both sides, in order that you may have the position formerly taken by the House, and the position formerly taken by the Senate.

The Senate formerly took the same position your conferees now take. To save my life, when our affirmative approval is required to this bill and these amendments, I cannot see how we can dodge the responsibility resulting from the Senate amendments.

Neither can I see why the employees of the House and the employees of the Senate should have any special treatment over and above the employees throughout the Federal service of the United States.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. McLEOD. Is it not a fact that the committee on the part of the House, in discussing it, contended that no discrimination should be made regarding certain employees without a complete survey of the whole employees? The question was raised that it pertained to different classes, and is it not a further fact that at the first conference it was practically understood that if we receded on the amendment for the additional employees that the Senate would recede on the additional salary?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was the understanding according to every member of the House conferees and according to the Clerk of the House that if we would recede on the amendments increasing the number of employees the conferees of the Senate would recede on the increase of salary. Since then one member of the conferees on the part of the Senate said that he did not so understand it. Our understanding and our agreement was that our agreement as to the number of employees in the Senate was in consideration of their receding on the increase of salaries of their employees of the Senate. I did not intend and would not have mentioned this part of our proceeding except for the direct question of my conferee.

Now, one other idea as to the parliamentary procedure between the two Houses. When either House places a legislative amendment on an appropriation bill and that amendment goes to conference, if the other House does not agree to it, it is understood that the body that proposes the legislative amendment shall recede.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. How many additional employees of the Senate does this involve?

Mr. BUCHANAN. My recollection is six. With two of them the increase is $1,500 each, and they are new employees of the Senate. Therefore, when you vote on this motion to insist, I want you to understand that you are voting that this House will take stock now and hereafter of how many employees the Senate will have and what their salaries shall be, and you are also voting that the Senate now and hereafter will take stock of how many employees the House has and what their salaries shall be. Individually I think that a wholesome practice. That is my individual conviction. When any bill requires affirmative action by the House and Senate both Houses are responsible for its passage, and are equally responsible to our constituents.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I agree with what the gentleman said, but I am wondering whether the committee has made any investigation of whether or not these increases are warranted. I think that is the real question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Some of them are, probably, but some are not.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Has the committee considered that question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Some of them are and some of them are not. I think that is a fair statement. There are salaries where an increase is warranted to make them comparable with the salaries of other employees in the House. What I contend now, and what I have contended with the committee, is that they should bring in a joint resolution, a legislative resolution, where the subject belongs, and not on an appropriation bill, and have an overhauling of the salaries. They should have an overhauling of the salaries of the employees of the Senate and the salaries of the employees of the House, and settle the matter by legislative action so that there will be no more trouble about it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I agree with the gentleman that we ought to stop legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is all I have to say to you. I just want you to know what you are voting on. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes. I think there is nothing that I can add to what has been so well said by the chairman of our committee. The entire issue involved here is an effort by the other branch of Congress to increase the salaries of some of its employees. When the legislative appropriation subcommittee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, was in session, several gentlemen came before it and presented very convincing reasons why certain employees of the House should have increases of salary. A number of our employees are very obviously underpaid. The Parliamentarian of the House is a much underpaid official, considering his importance in the legislative equation. [Applause.] One of the assistant cashiers in the Sergeant at Arms office is patently underpaid, as is our pair clerk, and so I might recite a very considerable list of employees of this branch, all of whom are inadequately remunerated for their services; but we took what we believed was a correct position, a very sound position, that in times like these there should be no increases in salaries either in the departments or in the legislative branch of the Government. We put thumbs down on all of those applications for increases in salaries in the personnel attached to the House of Representatives. The bill went to the Senate. In the Senate Committee on Appropriations certain increases in salaries were made in regard to the personnel of that branch.

Then the bill appeared for consideration on the floor of the upper branch of Congress, and there was a regular rush to add amendments to it, increasing the salaries of Senate employees. In two cases amendments were adopted on the floor giving to certain employees—and I have no doubt they are valuable and efficient employees—an increase of $1,500 each per annum as long as each one of those employees was continued in the service, and as a matter of fact neither one of the employees has been in the service any considerable length of time. I think one less than a year and the other perhaps about a year. I have no doubt they are capable and conscientious employees and perhaps should be better paid, but our legislative conferees took the position in the conference committee that having stood consistently, and as we thought righteously, against any increases in salaries in the personnel of the House or of the departments, we were not going to stand for these increases in the other body, and that is where the whole issue lies. As a matter of fact, this way of increasing salaries is altogether improper at best. As the able chairman of this committee has stated, the matter should be approached in a regular way through a regular legislative committee, after a complete study and very thorough consideration of these positions in their interrelationship one with the other.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I believe every Member of this House appreciates the splendid work the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] has done with his bill. He has the precedents behind him and is supported by them, and I believe the House is going to back him up. I am glad that he is a man of decision and backbone. Why not vote on the question now?

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman for his very kind remarks. I think the matter has been brought up here primarily to enable the House to express itself, as the proposition is one of importance, and I think that was the idea that actuated the chairman of our committee in making his able and illuminating presentation of the issue to which we have just listened.

Mr. BLANTON. All the precedents of the two Houses back the gentleman up in his position.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think all Members of the House ought to have a fair interpretation of the precedents in this matter, if there are any. As I understood the case read by the chairman of the committee, after four conferences and violent disagreements, it was finally decided that each House should have the discretion of fixing salaries of its employees.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was not decided that each House should have the discretion to employ and fix the salaries of its own employees. The Senate merely finally yielded after four conferences on that bill. In other words, the Senate position was like the conferees' position is now—just reversed.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Every Member of the House is held responsible by the country for all the money that is taken out of the Federal Treasury whether it goes to the Senate or somewhere else, because we are a party to it whenever we allow it to be taken out. Now, where they have an unlimited, tremendous contingent fund to draw from and they spend $50,000 for this and $100,000 for that without the House having any voice in it at all, it is not exactly fair to the House. The time ought to come when each House could have the right to pass upon the reasonableness of the expenses of each body. I think the position taken by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] is sound legislatively. It is sound because the people want it that way. The people want to depend on both Houses, and if we leave it to the voice of only one House, there could be extravagance the like of which the people never heard of before. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD].

Mr. MCLEOD. I just want to ask one question. Is it not the intention of the gentleman from Indiana to offer a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to make a survey of the situation that has been discussed this morning, relative to salaries?

Mr. LUDLOW. I understand there is a resolution now pending before the Committee on Accounts to make a survey of these various positions, and that it is being approached in a legislative way, which, as the gentleman himself said a moment ago, is the proper way to approach it.

Mr. MCLEOD. It is the only reasonable way to approach it.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am thoroughly in accord with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD] in what he said a moment ago. It was our understanding when we rejected these piecemeal proposals for increases in salaries that the entire subject would be studied in a thorough way, and that a resolution would be brought in that would do justice to everybody and take care of all worthy cases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been brought up in this way by the chairman of the committee in order that the House may understand exactly the issue involved here. As chairman of the subcommittee, I could not violate my sense of honor by agreeing to these Senate increases when we have consistently and uniformly denied increases to the personnel of the House of Representatives, in cases that are at least equally meritorious. There is no purpose on our part to violate the comity that exists between the two Houses; but there is a right way and a wrong way to revise salaries, and we stand for the right way.

I hope that the House will back us up and send this bill back to conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUCHANAN) there were—ayes 95, noes 4.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Messrs. LUDLOW, GRANFIELD, SANDLIN, BUCHANAN, MCLEOD, and SINCLAIR.

WHAT AND WHY MUST AMERICA CHOOSE

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a brief address which I made over the radio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I made in Washington, D.C., May 16, 1934, over the radio:

Since the depression set in, the American people, until a few months ago, have been in a state of political and economic hypnosis. Because we had attained a level of economic prosperity unequaled in the history of the world, we fell further and harder in the crash of 1929 than did any other country. We were bewildered by the irrational contradictions of our condition. We were confused and discouraged by poverty in the midst of plenty; by unemployment of millions with enormous areas of work waiting to be done. Our greatest national asset for 150 years had been the courage, initiative, and individual self-reliance of our people in all walks of life. Like the securities in our banks, this asset suddenly became frozen by fear and distrust. Having joyously sown the winds of greed, selfishness, dishonesty, and simian frivolity, we found it a grievous business when suddenly called upon to reap the inevitable whirlwind harvest of ruin.

In July 1932 unmistakable signs of recovery began to show and, judging by our experience in previous depressions, this movement would have continued until normal conditions returned. But the process of recovery was interrupted by the political campaign of 1932. The popular appeal in this campaign rested upon two propositions equally false, and, because of the universal distress, equally alluring. The first proposition was that the world-wide depression was caused by a political administration in Washington. The second proposition was that this world-wide depression could be cured by placing a different political administration at the helm in Washington. By an overwhelming nonpartisan vote the Democratic Party was returned to power, and on March 4, 1933, President Roosevelt in his inaugural address launched the new deal.

No peace-time President ever faced a more difficult task. But he approached his immediate problems with a show of courage and optimism which was contagious and which gained for him and his initial policies a popular confidence and support without parallel in our history.

The first objectives to which the new administration addressed itself were relief and recovery. Legislation was demanded by the President giving him almost unlimited control over our banking and monetary systems, economy in governmental expenditures, and industrial and agricultural recovery. This legislation was passed by Congress practically without discussion or amendment and by a nonpartisan vote.

During the special session of 1933, Congress, completely dominated by the President, was mainly occupied in denuding itself of its constitutional rights, duties, and responsibilities, and in clothing the Chief Executive with new autocratic powers without precedent in our peace-time history. All this was done in the name of emergency and with the almost unanimous support of public opinion.

As long as Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers confined their efforts to solving the problems of relief and recovery, the Republican minority in Congress refrained from exercising its constitutional functions of criticism and opposition. The whole country, in and out of Congress, regardless of politics, was united in waging a war for relief and recovery from the depression.

During the present session of Congress a revolutionary change has taken first place in the program of the Roosevelt administration. It is called "reform" by some of its advocates. A rapidly increasing number in both political parties call it "revolution." As yet it has not been presented to the American people as a coherent, all-inclusive plan, although its advocates seek to sugar-coat the pill by describing it as "national planning." Up to date it consists of a conglomeration of contradictory and hampering legislative restrictions upon American business, industry, and agriculture. One definite thing about this favorite child of the new-deal "brain trust" is the enormous increase in the national debt which it has created. Another certainty created by this revolution is the uncertainty as to the future, by which it has slowed down business recovery. It is not socialism. It is not fascism. It seems to be a species of denatured communism imported direct from Russia and decked out with a few American trimmings. It has been aptly described by Mr. Walter Lippmann as the "economy of bedlam."

The first objective of this Rooseveltian revolution is to make permanent the temporary and admittedly unconstitutional sections of the emergency legislation enacted by Congress to effect relief and recovery.

The second objective which has been to a considerable degree achieved is to bring all American industry, agriculture, trade, and commerce under the bureaucratic control of the Federal Government.

As soon as this new mass of contradictory and coercive legislation, which was opposed by the Republican minority in Congress and voted for under protest by many American-minded Democrats, reaches the enforcement stage, it will reveal the fact that the American farmer is regimented to the status of a mere cog in a bureaucratic machine. American industry and commerce are imprisoned in a bureaucratic strait-jacket. The free expression of adverse public and even private opinion has been made a crime. And by granting the Executive the tariff-making authority, lodged by our Constitution in Congress alone, the American worker will have had cut from under him the American standard of living and will inevitably be reduced to the economic level of the workers in low-wage countries.

This sovietizing of America rests upon the assumption that the old America, which was the hope of the world, and which in 150 years by practice of American principles and methods had become the greatest nation in all history, ceased to exist on November 8, 1932, and an entirely new America fashioned on the Russian model was born on that fateful day.

Professor Tugwell, the high priest of the new American sovietism, says, "Many observers are observing the contemporary Russian practice and are carefully recording the experience there which later may be of assistance to us." He further declares:

"We have a century and more of development to undo. The institutions of laissez faire have become so much a part of the fabric of modern life that the removing of their tissues will be almost like dispensing with civilization itself."

In outlining the steps to be taken in order to completely Russianize America under the new deal, Professor Tugwell proposes, first, "to uproot statutes and constitutions"; second, "to completely destroy all industry as industry has been developed in America"; and, third, "to completely destroy the sovereignty of the States."

To effect these changes he declares that—"it will require the laying of rough, unholy hands on many a sacred precedent, doubtless calling on an enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement."

As an earnest of how this new-deal revolution will work when the "enlarged and nationalized police power" takes hold, we have the case of the little New Jersey tailor who was fined $100 and sent to jail for a month because he had committed the heinous crime of pressing a pair of pants for 35 cents.

Since the essence of this new-deal revolution is political control and political planning of all business and all life, it is only fair to inquire what guaranty have we that political government will do better than the private citizen has done in planning and operating business and agriculture. If it is granted that business is shot through with dishonesty, corruption, and inefficiency, is it not equally true that politics is rotten with hypocricy, selfishness, greed, and stupidity? Why then swap a horse admittedly lame in one leg for another one lame in two or three legs? Under our present constitutional system the citizen can watch, criticize, and control his Government. But under this new-deal revolutionary scheme, which makes the citizen nothing and the Government everything, who is there to control the Government? In other words, why trade self-government by free citizens for a ruthless, bureaucratic despotism inflamed by half-baked theories and dominated by self-appointed and inexperienced advisers.

Against all this the Republican Party is girding itself for a finish fight. And in this inevitable conflict it will find a growing support from important groups in the Democratic Party who still believe in the principles of Jefferson. The next great political alinement in this country will be between American-minded citizens in both political parties on the one side, and Russian-minded citizens on the other.

The Republican Party once more faces a supreme responsibility to the Nation and to civilization itself. The issue is every hour becoming more clearly defined. It is simply this: Can we retain our American political liberties for which the English-speaking race has battled through a thousand years, and at the same time achieve for our citizens adequate economic freedom? In a word, the issue, is, Shall we as a nation remain American or become Russian? Within this issue lies all the materials for a progressive, sane, workable public policy which recognizes the existence of evils, economic, social, and cultural, and which proposes remedies that, while curing these evils, will at the same time strengthen and perpetuate all that is permanent in our national economy.

The distinguished Secretary of Agriculture tells us, in effect, that America must now choose between being regimented under an alien system of sovietized government control; or taking a place in open competition with the starving low-wage nations of the world, as just another unit in a high-sounding scheme of economic internationalism. I believe such a choice to be as unnecessary as it is un-American and ruinous.

In a period of social and economic transition such as the world is now passing through, we must expect and provide for fundamental changes in the ideals and mechanics of civilized existence. But granting this I do not believe that the American people can be induced to throw away their solid and infinitely valuable national achievements of 150 years in exchange for a foggy mass of alien social theories that have never succeeded anywhere, any time. Whatever we may choose in the future it will be, as in the past, an American-minded choice in accord with tested American ideals. We have no use for any kind of dictatorship at home. And still less use for any plan of internationalism that must inevitably reduce our standards of living to the proletarian levels now in ascendancy throughout the rest of the world.

GOLD REVALUATION

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes—preferably 5 minutes, but I will accept 3—on the gold-revaluation program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, the gold-revaluation plan to restore the currency represents the deliberate consideration and judgment of Congress, the House, the Senate, and the President, and is the most forward step in currency legislation taken by Congress and the President during the 100 years since Jackson's time. [Applause.]

Under the relief act passed May 12, 1933, and the declaration of the President following, approving the gold-revaluation plan as a means to restore the depleted money supply, all the machinery and the facilities to put in force the revaluation of gold to increase the supply of money, have been completed in every detail, installed and set up in working order, and all parts made ready to start in motion by the Executive power.

The gold stock of the country has been seized upon and taken over and paid for in gold certificates. And the 2,000,000,000 stabilization fund has been provided and made ready for use to carry out the plan as declared for.

If this plan was now put in operation promptly and without further delay, commodities, values, and the price level would rise promptly to a higher stage. [Applause.] And by next harvest and fall-crop market time, prices would be doubled or raised to the 1926 price level, and earnings and income from industry would be restored or far on their way. [Applause.]

The one question of the hour is, Why do we not do what we have said we should do? [Applause.] Why do we not do what we have determined to do? Why do we not do what we have prepared to do? [Applause.] Why do we not do what we are ready to do? [Applause.] Why do we not do what we can do any day, to restore the money supply back in circulation, stop the panic and bring a return of prosperity? [Applause.] Why are we ignoring and disregarding all we have said and done? Why are we holding all our completed plans and waiting [applause], to try out questionable experiments of creating and maintaining a scarcity to raise prices, without a claim or any practical assurance that such scarcity would accomplish the object?

If the gold-revaluation plan which has been provided in Congress, approved and declared for by the President, and the machinery for the operation of which has been set up and made ready to put in motion, and which could be started any day by the Treasury turning on the Executive power, was put in force and made to operate, the effect upon the country would be like magic. [Applause.] Values and the price level would start rising even before the money was actually in circulation, and the 1926 price level would be reached before all the money was available for use [applause], and farm values and the price level would be doubled by next fall's grain and stock market time. [Applause.] The perverted economic and monetary operations which brought on the panic would be reversed. Earnings and income and the buying and consuming power would be restored to 40 million farm population and dependents which in turn would start normal industrial production, restoring employment and labor's buying and consuming power. [Applause.]

The same powerful controlling financial interests which postponed and prevented currency-relief legislation for 12 years during three Republican administrations are now exerting their force and power, defying and interfering with this Democratic administration in the operation of the gold revaluation relief measure enacted and ready to be carried into effect. While all the mechanics, means, and facilities have been created, installed, and made ready for the issue and restoration of the money supply, they remain motionless and in silent waiting while the panic continues on and the people are in distress under cover of the same misleading plea and assurance of a better feeling and prosperity around the corner held out to postpone relief for three former administrations.

The Roosevelt administration came in power in the midst of a farm and industrial crisis. The people were writhing in the throes of an economic panic or depression. Industry was paralyzed and broken down and the people in want and distress, suffering for the common necessaries of life in the midst of plenty and great abundance. Congress was convened in special session to consider and analyze the cause and charged with the duty and obligation of determining upon a course, plan, and program providing for a solution, remedy, and relief.

THE FAILURE OF THE BUYING AND CONSUMING POWER

When Congress was convened in special session, there were many different theories advanced to explain the cause and account for the panic, among which were the want of confidence, overproduction of the vital necessities of life, the "extravagance" of starving, destitute people, with many other causes presented and assigned. But one by one these causes were considered and explained away, or time had proven their fallacy, or the claim of one had served to disprove the other, until one cause was simplified and made plain. And finally, ultimately, and at last, Congress, on full consideration and final judgment, in practically unanimous accord, agreed that the panic or depression had resulted from a failure of consumption, a failure of the buying and consuming power, the inability of the people to take, use, and consume what agriculture and industry produce.

THE FALL OF VALUES AND THE PRICE LEVEL

And it was the further determination of Congress that the failure of the buying and consuming power had resulted from the fall of values and the price level, leaving the people without earnings and income, without power to consume what industry produces. And it was further the judgment of Congress that to provide relief and a return of normal prosperity there must be a rise of commodity values, a restoration of the price level and the wage scale to restore earnings and income from industry and bring back to the people—the masses—their power to buy and consume what agriculture and industry produce.

WITHDRAWAL OF MONEY AND CREDIT

It was further found by Congress and the President, as shown by the monetary measures enacted, that the fall of values and the price level had resulted from a contraction of currency and credit, changing the relative value of money and commodities, which had multiplied taxes, debts, and fixed charges, taking away the people's surplus earnings, which constitute their buying and consuming power. And Congress and the President further found, by such currency measures enacted that a recovery from the panic required a restoration of the supply of money and credit to bring a rise of values and the price level and a return of earnings from income and industry.

THE CURRENCY PROVISIONS OF THE RELIEF ACT

To replenish the supply of money and credit, Congress enacted the relief currency provisions as embodied in the Recovery Act of May 12, 1933, which provided for four different forms of currency to restore money and credit withdrawn from circulation. One of these provided for the remonetization of silver, another for the revaluation of gold, another for a resort to Federal Reserve notes (if the Federal Reserve banks would assent), and the fourth for an issue of United States currency notes. By further and additional provisions of the act, and at the instance and request of the President, Congress delegated and gave to the Executive certain powers authorizing the President to employ or resort to one, more, or all of the different forms of currency provided to restore the depleted supply of money and credit.

POWER DELEGATED TO THE PRESIDENT

It was the agreement and consensus of opinion that any of the forms of currency provided, if resorted to in full and proper measure, would raise values and the price level and restore the buying and consuming power. But to meet the request of the President for full and complete control of the measure, and to facilitate, expedite, and hasten the currency operations provided for and bring about restoration and relief promptly, speedily, without hesitation, or delay, the currency plan to be resorted to, as well as the administration of the measure, was placed at the discretion of the President, with full power to employ any or all of the currency provisions provided under the act, to the end that no want of authority or power could intervene to postpone prompt and speedy relief.

Accordingly, as provided under the law, the President in the exercise of his discretion, after mature deliberation until October, declared for the revaluation-of-gold plan as the currency measure under which to restore the depleted money supply. And in February, following this declaration, the President seized upon and took over the gold, provided for a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund, and all preparations were ready and complete for the administration and enforcement of the law. But the provisions of the recovery act under which the gold revaluation plan was authorized to restore the money supply in circulation has never been put in operation or entered upon or carried into force and effect. The step authorized and prepared for has never been taken to restore the money supply. And today the money supply remains depleted the same as if the measure had never been enacted, the same as if the President had never exercised the option declaring for the revaluation of gold for the restoration of money and credit back in circulation.

THE OBJECT AND WHY REQUIRED

The declared object and purpose of the revaluation-of-gold plan is to bring a rise of commodity prices and thereby a return of earnings and income and a restoration of the buying and consuming power. And the declared goal and object to be reached is the general 1926 price level, which would be to double the price of all farm grain, crops, and stock, and the price of all commodities not arbitrarily fixed by combination or agreement.

Money values and commodity values are always relative and opposite. There can be no such relation as high money values and high commodity values maintained at the same time. If money values are high, commodity values will be low. The higher money values rise the lower commodity values will fall. If commodity values are too low, it is because money values are too high.

The revaluation of gold therefore involves the problem of the general price level, the relative value of money and commodities, the control of the money supply for a restoration and stabilization of prices measured in money. The one most important function or effect of the stabilizing facilities provided is to take from private manipulating financiers the power to control values and the price level and restore that power to the public. The power to control values and the price level now rests with the Federal Reserve Board, a private, selfish banking octopus, without responsibility for the public welfare. Under the gold revaluation program the power to control values and the price level will rest with the Secretary of the Treasury directly responsible to the President until that power can be recovered by Congress.

The practical effect of the revaluation of gold upon the money supply and the commodity price level will be the same as if new gold mines were discovered and the gold supply increased and doubled, which would double the money supply and in turn double the relative value of commodities. Gold is no longer in circulation as money. Currency is issued upon and made to represent gold. Money is not issued upon the quantity or corpus of the metal, but upon the value fixed, real, or assumed. If the existing supply of gold is revalued and its value is doubled, the supply of gold is doubled for the purposes of issuing money the same as doubling the quantity, and upon which double the amount of money can be issued while maintaining the gold standard.

The revaluation of gold is a problem involving the operation of economic laws as well as the principles of money. The immutable law of supply and demand applies to both money and commodities. Gold by itself and of itself is a commodity the same as wheat, corn, or lumber. And its value changes, fluctuates, rises, or falls with the supply and demand for gold the same as with any other commodity.

If the demand for a commodity is increased without a corresponding increase of supply, the value of the commodity will be increased. If the demand is decreased without a corresponding decrease of supply, the value of the commodity will fall. If the supply of a commodity is increased in proportion to the increased demand, the value will remain stable and unchanged. The demand upon gold has been doubled without a corresponding increase of supply, and the object of the revaluation of gold is to increase the supply of gold for money to counteract, neutralize, and equal the increased demand and thereby restore and stabilize the value of gold and the relative values of commodities.

The difficult part of the problem has been to discover the cause, how the increased demand upon gold was maneuvered and brought about by the international bankers and financiers. And the interesting and illuminating part is to realize and understand how the cause has been hidden, covered, and concealed in denial and evasion; how it has been kept a guarded secret for over 12 years, or since May 18, 1920, by the vandal character of the acts being such as to preclude acceptance and belief. For a proper consideration and understanding of the revaluation-of-gold plan, the cause, object, and purpose of the sudden increased demand upon gold must be explained, realized, and understood.

HOW THE VALUE OF GOLD WAS CHANGED

The international financiers and bankers who had amassed fortunes in billions during the great World War, profiteering upon the needs and emergencies of the Government, were not satisfied with their huge profits and gains. As the holders of the war-debt bonds and claims, they conceived a plan to increase and multiply the value of their bonds by increasing the value of the money in which paid, and which they organized and carried out, assuming currency reform, sound money, and an honest dollar.

Under a secret gentlemen's agreement, the precise form of which may never be known, the World War nations were all led in concerted action to make demand for gold to establish a so-called "international gold standard." In pursuance to this agreement and as a part of the plan, a secret bankers' meeting was held May 18, 1920, in Washington, D.C., under the very shadows of the Capitol, and at which a secret resolution was passed calling upon the Federal Reserve and member banks to call their loans and discounts, withdrawing currency and credit from circulation. Following this action and concurrently therewith the discount rate was raised, securities were sold under the open-market operations, loans were called in, and currency canceled until the circulation and credit was all but suspended.

The concerted action of the nations, led and directed under the secret gentlemen's agreement, making demand upon gold for money without an increased supply to meet the demands, made the corner and monopoly of gold complete and multiplied the value of gold manyfold relatively and over other values and prices here and throughout all the World War countries; and the operations of the Federal Reserve Board, in obedience to the secret resolution passed, contracting and withdrawing money from circulation, made the fall of values and prices promptly effective in our own country, and like action was taken in other nations to bring about and accomplish the same purpose.

It was this secret concerted movement, increasing and multiplying the demands upon gold and the action of the secret bankers' meeting and the contraction of money in other nations, which brought on the world-wide panic and a scarcity of money not only here but likewise in other World War countries. The revaluation-of-gold plan is a program to relieve from the increased demand upon gold by increasing the supply of gold in value for use as money and under which the money and credit withdrawn can be restored back into circulation and use.

There are two ways, plans, or systems under which to revalue gold for money. One is by maintaining a stabilization fund with which to bid for and buy gold upon the open markets of the world—by purchasing, increase the demand for gold when gold falls below the stable level, and by selling gold and relieving the demand when gold rises above the stable level. These operations contemplate control of the world price of gold for the purpose of international exchange—that is, for use of money between the nations—looking to world commerce and trade and the sale of our products abroad.

The other means provided and available for the revaluation of gold is the power vested in Congress under the Constitution to coin, issue money, and regulate the value thereof, and which can be exercised by the President under the delegation of powers conferred upon him. The powers conferred by the Constitution under which to revaluate our own gold and restore and stabilize values and the price level here can be exercised promptly and without delay and without waiting for international agreement or the consent of other nations.

Congress has always possessed this power, and there has never been a single day since this panic fell upon the country when Congress could not have revaluated gold, relieving the strain and demand upon gold, raised commodity values, and the price level, and restored normal prosperity within the confines of our own country.

HOW THE INCREASED VALUE OF GOLD WILL INCREASE COMMODITY VALUES AND THE PRICE LEVEL

The increased demand upon gold and thereby the increase in the value of gold without a corresponding increase in money in dollars, brought about by the international bankers, carried the same increased value of gold from gold to money based upon gold. And with their war-debt bonds and claims payable in money, in a fixed number of dollars, the same increased value of gold and money was carried to their bonds and claims, and increased and multiplied their value the same as gold and money, manyfold. But the same operations which increased the value of gold, money, and bonds produced an opposite effect upon commodity values and prices and forced down the value of property and the price level correspondingly and in proportion as gold and money was increased and raised in value.

The effect of these gold maneuvers and manipulations of the international bankers and financiers was to take value from commodities, property, and labor and shift and transfer that value to their bonds and war-debt claims. And every dollar the people have lost in the fall of commodity values, prices, and wages has been taken and is now held by these conspiring, manipulating bankers in the increased value of their war-debt bonds and claims.

Congress found, and it is universally agreed, that the panic was caused or resulted from a failure of the buying and consuming power—the power of the people to take, buy, and consume the products of farm, factory, mill, and workshop. And by following the course of unerring cause and effect, the precise operation of increasing the value of gold can be traced from the secret gentlemen's agreement and the secret bankers' meeting following to the rise of money values and the fall of prices and the destruction of the power of the people to take, buy, and consume what industry produces. Observing the principles and laws of money, that an increase of the value of money decreases commodity values and prices, the increased value of money—the dollar—and the resulting low values and prices, made money call for manyfold the property and commodities for the payment of debts and contract obligations. With taxes and debts left calling for the same number of dollars and the dollar made to call for three to four times the property and commodities, taxes and debts were increased and multiplied upon the people measured in property, commodities, and labor, in which, and only in which, they can be paid.

When this panic fell upon the country before the increased demand for and value of gold and the resulting increase in the value of money and the fall of commodity values and the price level, the farmers were selling not more than one third of their products with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges. And they were left with the other two thirds or more with which to buy, take, and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop, and with a balance over to use for payments on their debts and mortgages. But when the international financiers and bankers increased the demands for and the value of gold, increasing the value of money and the dollar and forcing down values and the price level, the farmers were compelled to sell instead of one third, three thirds or all of their crops, stock, and produce with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and were left with no part with which to buy and consume, destroying the buying and consuming power of 40,000,000 farm population and dependents.

The fall of values, destroying the farmers' buying and consuming power, finally left the retail merchant without demands, the wholesale house without sales, and the factory, mill, and workshop without orders. The wheels of industry slackened and slowed down and brought unemployment to industrial labor and destroyed the buying and consuming power of another 30,000,000 and their dependents. And the fatal circle of hard times, want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance was realized and complete.

The gold-revaluation plan is a program to reverse these gold-demand operations by increasing the value of gold, not to make gold high, scarce, and dear but to broaden the gold base, and upon which to increase the currency and number of dollars, which in turn will reduce the gold value of money, increase commodity values, prices, and wage scales, and thereby restore the buying and consuming power of the people.

Gold must be further valued higher and more currency issued upon the base.

THE GOAL OR OBJECT TO BE REACHED

The one first and most important step in any great public movement is the declaration of policy and purpose to be entered upon and carried out. The action of Congress and the President providing for the revalution of gold to double the basis of the money supply and for the restoration of the 1926 price level marks the completion of that one first step. This step is a great forward stride in the reform of our money system; and when the administration will go the whole way in carrying out the declared program, prosperity will be far on the way.

While the currency legislation was pending, and to warrant and induce the Congress to delegate its power over money and confer that power upon the President, the President made a clear statement of his intention and the use he would make of that power. The following is the President's declared purpose, made May 7, 1933, to Congress and the country, and the statement is so clear and unequivocal that it precludes any doubt or question of the object, purpose, or goal to be reached:

The administration has the definite objective of raising commodity prices to such an extent that those who have borrowed money will on the average be able to repay that money in the same kind of money which they borrowed.

This plain, clear, and unequivocal declaration of the purpose of Congress and the country has since been repeated and reiterated on different occasions and at different times, until October 22, 1933, when he said:

Finally, I repeat what I have said on many occasions, that ever since last March the definite policy of the Government has been to restore commodity price levels. * * * When we have restored the price levels, we shall seek to establish and maintain a dollar which will not change its purchasing and debt-paying power during the succeeding generations. I said that in my message to the American delegation in London last July, and I say it now once more.

It will be observed that the President has declared for a restoration of commodity prices which will allow men who have borrowed money to pay the loan in the same kind of a dollar as borrowed; that is, to repay under the same price level. Congress has generally agreed if not specifically declared for a restoration of the 1926 price level. The farm price level is now only 56 percent, or slightly over one half, of the 1926 price level and a rise to that level would practically double prices. But the President has declared for the restoration of the price level which would carry commodity prices even higher. The great bulk of the debts today are secured by renewal notes and mortgages and were originally and first created under a price level much higher than 1926 prices. If the President carries prices to the 1926 level, commodity values will be substantially doubled. If he changes the relative value of money to give the debtor the right to pay in the same dollar as borrowed, he will carry the price level much higher. And there is where the commodity price should be to restore the tax, debt, and interest-paying power, and the buying and consuming power of the people.

This is the price goal declared for by the President, and to say that he will not vindicate his pledge to Congress and the people of the country is to challenge the integrity of a President of the United States, to charge him with bad faith and false pretense to obtain a grant of power. The President will carry out this pledge to Congress and the people. The only uncertain element remaining is the time in which under this plan the price rise declared for can be accomplished. The President says it can be accomplished and that it will be accomplished. And by the gold-revaluation plan it can be accomplished in record-breaking time.

WHAT IT MEANS AND TO WHAT APPLIED

It must be forever and eternally kept in mind that money values, commodity and labor values, are always relative and opposite. If money values are high, commodity and labor values will be low. If money values rise higher, commodity and labor values will fall lower. The rise and the corresponding fall and the fall and corresponding rise of money, commodity values, and prices, we call fluctuation of values or changing price levels. Stabilization, as the term is used in the new currency legislative program, means to establish at a certain fixed point the relative value of money with commodity values, prices, and labor, so that commodity values, prices, and labor will be held as determined and fixed at a constant or unchanging level.

In stabilization, money is only an incident to the main object to be reached or attained, as fixing an unchanging bushel or pound is only an incident in ascertaining the amount or weight of products sold or exchanged. Money is a measure of commodity and labor values as a bushel is a measure of quantity, or as a pound is a measure of weight and measures out the amount of goods or produce, or the amount of labor or services to be performed required for the payment of taxes, interest and debts, other obligations, or in exchange for other commodities or services.

Stabilization is to keep the money measure of commodities, labor, and labor products unchanging and always calling for the same amount of value. Taxes assessed are payable in money. Debts and contracts for money are payable in money. The people do not raise, grow, or produce money. The people must buy money with their goods, products, and labor with which to pay taxes, debts, interest, and money charges the same as men who have money must buy goods and products with which to live. Money is the value measure, measuring out the amount of commodities and labor required to pay a certain amount of taxes or to pay a certain amount of interest or debts, or to exchange for other property, for other commodities, or other services.

If commodity, labor values, and prices are lowered, the money measure is enlarged and calls for more. More labor and commodities are required to pay taxes, more required to pay interest, debts, and mortgages, and the burden of taxes and debts is increased upon the people. If commodity and labor values and prices are higher, the money measure of commodities and labor is smaller and calls for less commodities and labor to pay taxes, for less commodities and labor to pay mortgages, and the burden of taxes and debts will be lighter upon the people.

Under fluctuating, changing values and prices controlled by the money measure, the farmer who borrowed $5,000 when he could have paid the debt with 3,500 bushels of corn has since been compelled to give up 9,000 bushels of corn to pay and satisfy the same mortgage debt. Whereas if there had been a stabilization of prices by money, the farmer could have paid his mortgage with 3,500 bushels of corn, the same as when he signed the mortgage and would have left 5,500 bushels of corn to sell, the proceeds of which to use to buy and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop.

Under stabilization through the control of money the same amount of taxes and debts would always call for the same amount of commodities and labor products, and men could always be assured when they sowed of what price they would receive when they reaped.

WHY PRICE RISE MUST PRECEDE STABILIZATION

For want of public control, stabilization, and publicity of money operations, the international financiers and bankers secretly changing the money measure of value and enlarging the money bushel or pound for the measurement of grain and weights of livestock called for by the dollar, debts and their bonds and claims, the dollar measure was made to call for such great amounts of commodities, labor, and the products of labor to pay taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages that nothing was left for the farmer to sell with which to provide for himself and family, which destroyed the farmers' buying and consuming power and brought the panic upon the country.

There have been great influence and pressure brought to bear upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration by the United States Chamber of Commerce, representing under cover and concealment the special monied interests of the country, and demanding immediate unconditional stabilization. This peremptory demand for stabilization is reinforced by intimidation and threat of the horrors of so-called "inflation", which is the bankers' word and term for higher commodity prices and wages. It was the fall of values and the price level, destroying the buying, consuming, and debt-paying power, that brought the panic upon the country. And so without a rise to the 1926 price level, a rise more than doubling present prices, there can be no relief from this depression.

It is for this reason that stabilization becomes the most important and vital part of the currency or money program as well as the whole program for recovery. The few certain, special money manipulators, who have always evaded and opposed stabilization while prices were falling—to bring about or allow a further fall of value—now when prices are to be raised or restored are demanding stabilization before such restoration in order to hold down the present low price level.

Without a rise and stabilization of the 1926 price level or higher price level there can be no relief from the tax burden; there can be no escape from impossible debts, there can be no restoration of the buying and consuming power. Without such restoration and stabilization at this price level, mortgages on real estate at present values can never be renewed or paid by mortgagors and must be foreclosed and the real estate sold, with a deficiency judgment reaching over to be a lien against their personal effects and chattel property. Without a restoration and stabilization at this price level, building-and-loan mortgages can never be collected and the millions of building-and-loan deposits can never be paid, millions of homes will be lost to families, and millions will be lost to building-and-loan depositors.

Without a rise and stabilization of the price level, private industry cannot be restored, the tax burden will be continued to maintain the dole of public employment until its mounting, crushing weight breaks the already nearly exhausted Treasury and piles high the burden of public debts until repudiation will be the only hope for relief. Without a rise and stabilization of the price level, the struggling people can never escape from the merciless strangle hold of misers, Shylocks, and money changers, demanding their remorseless pound of flesh in the payment of debts calling for property, products, and wages manyfold the amount contracted for when made. Without a rise and stabilization of the price level, a restoration of private industry and earnings and income to employers, for want of public funds to pay and the withdrawal of public employment, we shall be drifting far and fast in the course, not on our way to a return of prosperity but to chaos, disorder, civil anarchy, and revolution.

WHY THE PRICE RISE HAS NOT BEEN REALIZED

These currency-relief measures of May 12, 1933, were enacted for the sole purpose of restoring the volume of money to circulation and thereby increasing values, the price level, and the wage scale. Immediately following the passage of this law, psychologically, on anticipation and belief that the new money would be issued and put in circulation, values and the prices started to rise. But as the money was not issued and put in circulation, the rise begun, lagged, slowed down, and fell back, and the relief assured was not realized.

The reason why values and the price level have not been raised and restored is because the step for that purpose provided under the gold-revaluation plan has not been entered upon and taken. Only the foundation or basis for such a step has been provided and completed. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury has entered upon certain gold-buying operations or manipulations by offering to purchase gold at a price higher than the world market.

These gold-purchasing operations are speculative, problematical, and uncertain as to whether the gold price will be raised or the gold bid for will come to the United States. They are further uncertain and problematical both in the time they will become effective and in the results when realized as the same will effect price levels in this country. But it is certain in any and all events that the people of this country must wait for relief until we shall have first raised values and the price levels of all the gold-using countries of Europe and changed the commodity values of the world.

The gold-revaluation plan, reducing the gold content of the dollar, has operated with the effect to devalue the dollar abroad, but without appreciable force here to cause a rise of values and the price level. The reason for this difference and effect is that the dollar abroad is taken only for the gold that it calls for, that is, for its 59-cent gold content. But here, as it will pay 100 cents of taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages, it is still taken for 100 cents, and the relative value of money and commodities is not changed.

The reason that there has been no rise in values and the price level, as contemplated and claimed for the law, is that nothing has been put in force to cause such rise in values and the price level. If there had been a rise in values and prices, such rise could not have been explained or accounted for on any recognized economic theory, or any principle or law of money. It would have been a phenomenon defying analysis, solution, or explanation. Before there can be such rise in values, the price level ,and the wage scale, another and further step must be taken under the gold-revaluation plan.

THE FURTHER STEP REQUIRED TO PROVIDE RELIEF

Before the gold-revaluation plan provided for by Congress under the Farm Relief Act and declared for by the President will operate to raise values and the price level here, there must be another and further step taken. There must be an increased amount of currency issued upon the increased value of gold and this currency put into circulation. When this further and second step is taken and money issued and put into circulation and stabilized in the proper amount and not less than the 1926 price level, farm values and the price level will be doubled, thereby doubling the tax-paying power and the interest and debt-paying power of corn, wheat, hogs, cattle, and all farm products.

This increased price of farm products and the realization of an increased income from the farm will leave a greater surplus with the farm population of the country, after the payment of taxes, interest, and debts, to be used in buying and consuming power. This restored buying and consuming power of the 40,000,000 farm population and dependents will start orders going back from retail merchant to wholesale house, factory, mill, and workshop, and will restore employment to industrial labor.

Congress has completed its work. There is nothing more to be done to restore the money to circulation except to carry out and put the law in force, which is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury as the executive officer of the Government. This step could have been taken first before the gold-buying operations began to raise the price level of the European countries, and relief provided here immediately instead of postponing restoration here until we raise the price level of the world.

It is estimated that since the panic began the people have lost over $12,000,000,000 in earnings, a vast and bewildering sum of money, and that they are still suffering a loss of over a billion dollars in earnings and income every year during the continuance of this panic.

The same special money interests which successfully prevented relief-currency legislation during the three former administrations to restore the money supply and raise the price level, are now throwing monkey wrenches in the currency machinery and holding back and preventing the gold-revaluation plan from being carried out and put in operation in the one and only way to provide relief to the people.

There has never been a single day since the beginning of this panic when Congress could not have acted and revaluated our gold supply, issued new money on the gold standard, and restored the money supply in circulation and stopped this panic and relieved the people. And there has not been a single day since Congress enacted the currency provisions of the Farm Relief Act, May 12, 1933, when new money could not have been issued based upon and redeemable in gold to restore the money supply in circulation and to start the country back to normal and permanent prosperity promptly, without hesitation or delay.

There is no reason why prosperity should now be further delayed or postponed and the country burdened with crushing taxes to support the people in enforced idleness, except to provide the bondholding classes with investments by, through, and from which to drain the people of vast sums as interest.

ONLY ONE MEANS TO RESTORE PRICES

As before explained to the House, the gold-buying operations and manipulations, bidding higher to raise the price of gold in Europe and the markets of the world, is effective only externally, that is, abroad, and only to devalue the dollar relative to the currencies of gold-standard countries. This first step taken will not bring a rise in values, the price level, and the wage scale or have any appreciable effect here, or, if realized, will be negligible and incidental only. Under economic laws and the principles of money as fixed and certain as life and death, only an increased volume and supply of money issued and made available in circulation will bring such rise of values and the price level.

The one and only salvation and relief for farming and agriculture, and incidentally for all other classes, is a rise of farm values and prices. So that after the farmers have paid their taxes, interest, and fixed charges, they will have remaining a greater surplus for use as buying and consuming power. This is the power to buy, take, and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop, and thereby restore employment to labor and the buying and consuming power of the industrial population.

All other means or so-called "remedies" are mere makeshift maneuvers, and only postpone the day of reckoning when the farmers must come face to face with foreclosure, insolvency, and bankruptcy, foreboding a system of landlord and tenant in America. And with the failure of the farmers, the great toiling and laboring masses, moved by the first impulse of life to live, will be misled to revolt and strike to secure employment and a living wage by other than orderly means and civil process.

THE PROGRESS AND STATUS OF THE PLAN

Congress and the President are in accord and have agreed that the cause of the panic is the failure of the buying and consuming power, and that this failure of the buying and consuming power has resulted from the fall of values and the price level, and is likewise the cause of the continuance of the depression. Congress and the President are in further agreement that the fall of values and the price level has resulted from the failure of the money supply, from an insufficient volume of money in circulation, and that a remedy and relief from the panic requires a restoration of the supply of money to circulation. Congress and the President have also agreed that the remonetization of silver, the revaluation of gold, a resort to Federal Reserve notes, and the issuance of United States currency notes are all available monetary measures by and through which to restore the volume and supply of money in circulation.

The greatest merit of the gold-revaluation plan over the other currency measures provided for is the policy and strategy of the legislation to forego and forestall the propaganda organized to discredit currency-relief measures by raising the hue and cry of "fiat money" or so-called "inflation" and "printing-press money." The gold-revaluation plan resorted to by the President provides for money issued upon the gold standard, based upon a gold reserve, redeemable in gold; to be issued upon the increased value of gold, which operates with the same effect as discovering new gold mines and doubling the corpus of the gold supply. The President is to be congratulated not only on the merits of the gold-revaluation plan but also on the policy and strategy exercised in his choice of the currency measures, thereby to meet, forestall, and foil the propaganda organizing to defeat the operations of any and all currency-relief measures.

On the passage of the Currency Relief Act of May 12, 1933, providing for these several currency-relief measures and for the option and discretionary power in the President to carry one or more of these into force and effect, to restore the depleted volume and supply of money, commodity values, prices, and wages, psychologically on anticipation of the new money, immediately started rising to a higher level, carrying an increase of prices and all farm values and prices, which only stopped and receded when the expected increase of money was not issued and put into circulation.

There are two steps which can be taken in the administration of the gold-revaluation plan. One is to revalue our own stock of gold, the largest of any nation in the world, to the agreed value of $41.34 an ounce, or to such value as would restore the 1926 price level, and upon that increased value of gold issue the new money to go in circulation. This step could have been taken immediately after the enactment of the law or on any day since that date, and the new money promptly put in circulation based upon and redeemable in gold, and commodity values, prices, and the wage scale would have begun a rise psychologically with the announcement and would have been restored promptly in the course of rising values and wages. But this step under the gold-revaluation plan has never been taken or entered upon.

The other step which can be taken and entered upon under the gold-revaluation plan contemplates a course of bidding for gold on the world markets with other nations, and using the two billion stabilization fund to make good the higher prices bid for gold, requiring foreign nations to bid higher or lose their gold to the United States. This step and prices, under which the people of the United States and prices and under which the people of the United States must wait for their remedy and relief until the United States shall have first forced up world values and the price level in our buying contest with foreign nations.

THE COURAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

There has been no such rise or restoration of commodity values, and the price level as contemplated under the gold-revaluation plan and as claimed for the plan by Congress. This failure has not been from any want of merit in the gold-revaluation plan of relief, but because the step to make the plan effective for this purpose has never been taken and entered upon. No other man succeeding to the Presidency has ever possessed the courage and will to take this great forward step in defiance of the money-monopoly interests to restore the money supply of the people. The gold-revaluation program has been hindered and delayed by spy expert advisers and unfriendly Treasury hold-over officials by diverting the operations and administration to the gold-buying, bidding operations.

BELATED SILVER LEGISLATION

Regardless of the merits of silver as a means to restore the money supply, it is apparent that no effective measure for that purpose can now be agreed upon and prepared for administration at this late date of the closing session; and, if passed by Congress in such form, would be disapproved by the President. Such further consideration of silver legislation will not only prove fruitless and of no avail to accomplish and carry out the purpose intended, but will serve to delay and further postpone the administration and enforcement of the gold-revaluation program already agreed upon and waiting to be enforced to restore money to circulation. While the remonetization and use of silver would be an effective means to restore the money supply, a mere purchase of a limited amount of silver without positive and mandatory provisions for the issue of currency upon the metal would be as abortive and ineffective to restore the money supply required as a thin sprinkle of rain to break a long, protracted drought. The currency program adopted by Congress and declared for and prepared for by the President offers the only hope of currency relief and should now be concentrated upon by Congress and the President for administration to restore the supply of money and credit and bring back earnings and income to the people.

THE PLAN HAS NOT FAILED

The gold-revaluation plan provided by the Democratic Congress and declared for by the President has not failed of its object and purpose. It has only been hindered, postponed, and delayed by the special money interests opposing and preventing its operation and enforcement. It has never been carried into effect or allowed to operate. If enforced, in good faith and courageous administration, it will remedy the panic, restore normal prosperity, and justify every claim of Congress and the President.

What we need in this country today is more of the wisdom of Thomas Jefferson, who foresaw and warned against the evils of the private control of money as "more dangerous to the liberties of the people than standing armies in times of peace." And even more than the wisdom of Jefferson, we need the courage of Andrew Jackson to challenge and defy the money interests in their course and policy of intimidation, to hinder, delay, postpone, and defeat the administration of relief-currency measures, as he challenged, defied, and defeated the money power of his own day and times organized under the name and style to assume the character of a public agency, of the "Second United States Bank."

CASS GILBERT

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked your indulgence for a few moments this afternoon while I pay a brief tribute to a Minnesota man who made for himself a name of national and even international significance. Cass Gilbert, the father of the modern skyscraper and the supreme master builder of his time, who died last week, was during the 30 formative years of his life a resident of Minnesota. There he received his early education in the St. Paul public schools and at Macalester College. After serving a year's apprenticeship in an architect's office, he went east to attend the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He completed his professional training abroad, and then returned to Minnesota to engage in the practice of architecture. In 1895 his design for the State capitol at St. Paul was accepted. That stately structure of white marble was an architectural triumph; it gave its builder immediate and world-wide recognition. St. Paul was too small to hold him. Reversing Horace Greeley's advice, he went east to "grow up with the country."

In New York he did not have to endure the years of struggling apprenticeship that have been the lot of most young men who have gone there to pursue fortune. Almost immediately he began to pierce Manhattan's sky with towers of such incredible beauty that the whole world stopped to look.

A great architect must be a poet as well as builder. He must know truth as well as beauty. Cass Gilbert saw that in order to have significance business must take on a spiritual quality; it must be more than a bartering of goods, a pursuit of profits. To be sure, he did not close his eyes to realities nor fail to see how utterly the actual fails to approach the ideal; but, like the prophets of old, he knew the value of unattainable goals. So his great genius set itself to the task of expressing in architectural form his conception of what business should seek to become. With a boldness which now challenges admiration, but then called forth derision, he did not hesitate to use the motif of gothic cathedrals in building his greatest skyscraper, the Woolworth Tower.

In the shadow of this Capitol stands the still unfinished Supreme Court Building, another product of his genius, chaste in lines that would have done credit to the builders of "the glory that was Greece." In this, as in his other great works, Cass Gilbert has alined himself with those architects who still reverence the past. He never built any modernistic dirigible-mast monstrosities, for he knew that utility does not preclude beauty, and that beauty, universal as to time and place, does not change with vogues and vagaries. Modern he was, but modern in the true sense; he never created something new in order to create something different; he adapted that which was time-tested and authentic to new needs and purposes.

He himself expressed this thought when he said: "My plea is for beauty and sincerity, for the solution of our own problems in the spirit of our own age, illuminated by the light of the past. To carry on, to shape new thoughts, new hopes, new desires in new forms of beauty as we may and can, but to disregard nothing of the past that may guide us in doing so." In those words Cass Gilbert showed himself a sound statesman as well as a great architect.

I hope that I shall be pardoned if in this connection I take occasion to answer the charge that has sometimes been made, that the Middle West is intellectually sterile. The man who, probably more than any other, is responsible for disseminating that libel is a Minnesotan, the author of Main Street. Sinclair Lewis is himself a refutation of the charge. The State that I have the honor to represent has made many cultural contributions to the Nation. If "the great American novel" has yet been written, many critics would pick the epic of the prairies, Giants in the Earth, for the distinction. Its author, O. E. Rolvaag, was a Minnesota man. Knut Hamsun, who wrote Hunger and The Growth of the Soil, developed his literary talent while a street-car conductor in Minneapolis. Paul Manship is making for himself a place beside Rodin and Thorwaldsen in the pantheon of sculpture. The St. Olaf Choir, consisting of young men and women recruited from the farms and villages of the Middle West, has won plaudits in the concert halls of two continents. Every year the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra plays in the great music centers of America.

Minnesota has made her contributions to science. Drs. William J. and Charles H. Mayo have not only made the little town of Rochester known throughout the world of medicine, but have established and maintained research laboratories in which the boundaries of human knowledge have been extended. In the realm of statesmanship Minnestota has raised to eminence such men as William Windom, Cushman K. Davis, and Knute Nelson, as able as any who have raised their voices in this and the other body, and Frank B. Kellogg, whose legal attainments were recognized in his election to the World Court.

The obvious answer to the charge that there is crudeness and uncouthness in the Middle West is that no part of the United States, or of Europe either, is free from what supercilious critics have called "Americana." But crudeness and uncouthness are not characteristic; they do not measure the cultural level of the people. Unproductive ground does not yield good wheat. An intellectually sterile population would not produce men like Cass Gilbert, who, as a Washington editorialist said last week, "might have walked unashamed with Michelangelo and Da Vinci, with Raphael and Beethoven."

30-HOUR WEEK

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I am taking the time of the House at this time to say that I have just filed a new petition, which is now on the Clerk's desk. This petition will discharge the Rules Committee, if 145 names are secured, from consideration of the bill S. 158, the Black bill, the 30-hour week bill, which passed the Senate at the last session of Congress. If the House signs the 145 names, this bill would come up on June 11; and if the House passed the Black bill with amendments, then the bill would go to conference instead of having to go to the Senate and be sent to a committee. If the House passes the Black bill without amendment, the bill would immediately go to the President for his signature.

So I am asking all the Members, including the 76 Members who have signed the Zioncheck petition, to kindly sign this new Connery petition, which is no. 30, the 30-hour week bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] is one of the most loyal and patriotic men in the House. Suppose the President were to send us a message today or tomorrow asking Congress, on behalf of the people of the country, to adjourn by June 1, would not my friend from Massachusetts deem it his loyal and patriotic duty as an American citizen and a good Democrat to grant the wishes of the President?

Mr. CONNERY. I would do what I considered my duty as a loyal American citizen and vote against adjournment so as to enact this 30-hour week bill to protect 10,000,000 American unemployed and put them back to work.

Mr. BLANTON. I am afraid the gentleman would not have the majority with him, as the majority will support the President's wishes.

Mr. CONNERY. We will see about that. I have seen stranger things than that happen, I may say to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I have followed the gentleman in a great many matters, but I am afraid this is one in which I cannot follow him. I am going to support the President.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from Texas asked the question: If the President should send a message to Congress asking them to adjourn for the American people—am I quoting the gentleman correctly?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and the Constitution, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. TRUAX. No; the gentleman just spoke about the people.

Mr. BLANTON. No. The Constitution says that when the two Houses of Congress disagree as to adjournment the President himself can adjourn Congress when he gets ready, and I hope he will.

Mr. TRUAX. I am not talking about the provisions of the Constitution. I am talking about the people of this country. I was elected at large in my State, and I have not received one single request from anyone to adjourn this Congress. They say this is the greatest Congress the country ever had. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another suggestion?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If the President should ask Congress to adjourn by June 1, the loyal Democrats of the House would overwhelm the gentleman when he asked them not to adjourn.

Mr. TRUAX. I deny the assertion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. I shall not take much of the time of the House. I merely want to make this very clear: That the new Connery petition, petition no. 30, is designed to secure quicker action on the 30-hour week bill. It will discharge the Rules Committee on the Black bill, which has already passed the Senate, if we are in session June 11 and within the 6-day limit.

The Black bill passed the Senate without a roll call and it received a tremendous plurality. If we discharge the Rules Committee and the House takes the bill up on June 11 and passes Senate bill 158 without amendment, it would then go to the President immediately for his signature. If the bill is passed with amendments, the bill will go to conference; but in either event we will save such time as might be required to refer a House bill to the Senate committee.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that daily the newspapers carry accounts of strikes, strikes, strikes—strikes out in the West, and strikes down in the South, strikes up in the North, strikes in the East. Why are the workers striking? They are striking for shorter hours and better wages. The passage of the 30-hour week bill will give them the shorter hours, and with the amendment which we intend to offer in the committee it will give them better wages. The passage of the bill amended in this way will save a lot of trouble, turmoil, and strikes in the United States, and will give labor its place in the sun.

The President of the United States, on March 5, speaking to all the leaders of industry in Constitution Hall in this city, asked them, as President of the United States, to shorten hours and increase wages. That was on March 5. Today is May 21. At this date less than one twenty-fifth of 1 percent of the industrial leaders of the Nation have acceded to the wishes of the President of the United States. I say to my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that I shall vote against adjournment to make these industrial leaders do what they were asked to do by the President of the United States—to shorten hours and increase wages.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, having mentioned him.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, my friend from Massachusetts does not approve of plasterers and painters in Washington who have been getting $9, $10, and $12 a day in steady, continuous employment for several years, striking on Government jobs for more pay, when other men elsewhere are starving to death and have had no work for 2 years?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, my friend from Texas should know that all these men are striking for is a decent living wage. Establish a decent living wage, and you will not have men starving to death; bring them up to the union wage, and we will not have any starvation in the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. May I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the Senate bill is now before the Rules Committee?

Mr. CONNERY. It is.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And the Committee on Labor, of which the gentleman is chairman, favorably reported the bill?

Mr. CONNERY. The Committee on Labor reported the bill unanimously.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Senate bills do not go to the Rules Committee.

Mr. CONNERY. Well, the bill is on the calendar, and I presented to the Rules Committee my Resolution No. 142, asking for a rule on Senate bill 158. I never received a rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Did the gentleman ever ask for a rule on the bill?

Mr. CONNERY. I will qualify that and state to the gentleman that I spoke to the Speaker and to the majority leader at that time, and they said they had conferred with the President, and the administration was not in favor of the bill, because of the provision in the bill which would make foreign nations go on a 5-day week if they wished to ship goods to the United States. So it was useless to ask for a hearing.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Has the House Committee reported the Senate bill?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; unanimously.

Mr. HASTINGS. Without amendment?

Mr. CONNERY. With amendments.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is asking that the Senate bill be passed without House amendments?

Mr. CONNERY. If the House so desires; yes. I should prefer amendments which the Committee on Labor might see fit to offer on the bill to take care of the wage situation.

Mr. COX. The gentleman thinks he is safe in the assumption that he will not get a rule from the Rules Committee?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I do not think I will discuss it, because I do not want to break any confidences, but I will say that I am safe in the assumption that the Rules Committee will not give me a rule.

Mr. SCHULTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman realizes the conditions in his own district as well as in other districts?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SCHULTE. I am referring to the 30 hour bill. The reason the 30 hour bill is demanded at this time is because there is so much chiseling going on by the big industries.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. That is one of the reasons.

Mr. SCHULTE. If the gentleman would permit me in his time, I should like to read a letter.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. The letter I refer to is as follows:

STATE OF INDIANA.

DEAR SIR: I wish to notify to you about the place where I am employed—Steel Co. of Indiana Harbor; 76-inch stripe mill. In this mill there are a number of men working 10 hours a day and 7 days a week. They work by hour rate. They do not work according to the N.R.A. schedule. Some men in this mill can't get 3 days a week while others are working 7. I am asking you to check this for the sake of other men and myself.

That is just a sample of the letters we are getting from the industrial centers.

Mr. CONNERY. I have hundreds of similar letters on my desk. May I ask in conclusion that all House Members sign this Connery petition immediately. It is petition no. 30. In my opinion, the passage of legislation to insure a 5-day week 6-hour day in industry will do more to relieve unemployment in the country than any other measure I know of.

The American Federation of Labor and all union labor throughout the country are unanimously supporting this petition and this legislation.

Congress should not adjourn without passing this 30-hour week bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes on the subject matter that has just been discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not propose to object to this request, we have already consumed an hour. This is an important day. If we are going to take up the time of Consent Calendar day with speeches, we will not get anywhere with the calendar. I serve notice now that I shall object to any further requests for time to make speeches.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would be recreant to very strong convictions regarding the chief cause of the unemployment of labor and what must be done to reabsorb unemployed labor in industry, if I did not do something more than sign petitions to have these labor bills placed on the calendar.

It is not simply a question whether we like a 30-hour week and a 6-hour day. It is not a question whether we want these shorter workweeks and shorter workdays. The fact may as well be faced that we must have them. They are the major solution of unemployment in industry. The outstanding problem facing our civilization, the greatest challenge to its statesmanship, is to furnish employment so that every man willing to work may find work at a wage which will maintain the American standard of living. The most terrible thing in this country today is the presence of not less than 10,000,000 workers who cannot find work and who must look to charity, public or private, for their daily bread. It is intolerable, and if long continued will not only impair the moral and physical fiber of the individual but will lower the whole American standard of manhood and citizenship. The future of America is bound up in this problem.

I do not agree with those who say that the National Recovery Act has contributed nothing to the solution of this problem. The National Recovery Act as a whole has not only reduced the hours of labor and increased wages and increased employment to the extent of two or three million workers but it furnishes the model of a new system of relationships between industry, labor, and the consuming public. Uncontrolled production, cutthroat competition, low prices to the producer and high prices to the consumer, long hours and short pay, too much food and starvation, must pass out of the picture. The National Recovery Act, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and practically all the acts of this remarkable and revolutionary Congress show the way. I have confidence that, by whatever means necessary, we shall follow along.

The 30-hour week and the 6-hour day are not to be regarded as were the earlier movements for a reduction in work hours—from a primarily humanitarian standpoint for the worker. The endless-hour day and the endless-day week cried to Heaven for pity on the wage slave. He was the man with the hoe. The picture now is far different than what it was when Victor Berger spoke on the floor of this House about the men who worked 12 hours per day 7 days per week as men who had no time to thank God and nothing to thank Him for.

We are confronted with the problem now of men who have nothing but time in which to thank God and nothing to thank Him for. I am not going to repeat in detail what I have said on former occasions about this problem. I shall repeat only one short sentence: The return of prosperity will not solve unemployment. I might add that with so much unemployment, prosperity cannot return. We must spread the load of society out over the machine, or the whole thing will break down. This generalizes the problem as I see it. We may as well face the issue. Shutting our eyes will not remove it. Putting off the evil day, if that is the way it looks to you, will not avail. I think the statement cannot be challenged that the workers, in the main, have supported the program of the President, including the recovery acts. But these millions of unemployed, living in want, and these other millions who have employment, living in fear, do not feel that the program has gone as far as practicable or necessary.

I know it is disputed that the machine is mainly responsible for the growing, chronic unemployment of labor and it is contended that the resumption of normal activity in all lines of business would reabsorb the great majority of these idle millions. The statistics of railway employment, in my opinion, furnish a reliable index as to which of these views is true.

In 1920 the total number of employees on railways exceeding 100 miles in length, and known as "class I" carriers, was in round numbers 2,000,000. In 1929, which witnessed the greatest volume of traffic in the history of rail transportation, the number of employees on these lines had decreased to 1,660,000. In other words, taking the period of the post-war boom, considered the most prosperous era in the history of any nation, the number of railway employees decreased 340,000, while at the same time the volume of railway business reached its maximum.

It must be conceded that growing competition by water, by truck, and by bus are cutting into the railways, creating a situation which demands the centralized control and regulation of all forms of transportation, to the end that each may make its proper contribution to the transportation business of the country, while preserving all other forms. But water, trucks, and busses had reached a very high stage of competition with railways in 1929, notwithstanding which the railways in that year handled their maximum tonnage and handled it with a decrease of about 18 percent in the working personnel.

The roll of the railway unemployed since 1929 has reached the enormous total of 800,000, and with 400,000 more insufficiently employed to maintain a decent standard of living. Between 1920 and 1932, employment on class I railroads declined from a fraction over 2,000,000 to a fraction over 1,000,000. The principal cause for this alarming showing is to be found in a sentence stated by Mr. A. F. Whitney, who is the chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association; that is, head of the associated railway organizations. Mr. Whitney said:

> In the last decade productivity of railroad workers has increased by leaps and bounds, but nothing has been done to overcome its evil effects on the workers. The result is that hundreds of thousands of skilled railroad workers of years' training in the safe and efficient transportation of people and property have been forced into the bread lines. * * * Railroad managements have stated that they can now handle a 20-percent increase in business without any increase in employment.

Heavier motive power, longer trains, labor-saving devices, endless economies, have produced these results, deplorable directly in the case of the workers and indirectly affecting everybody and everything in the country, and what is going on in the railroad world is going on in all other lines of industry, in agriculture, and everything else. Two men are doing a job. Somebody invents a machine which enables one of them to do it, making a tramp of the other. Then the machine has to shut down.

I need not resort to tonnage statistics or the statements of someone else for all my knowledge on this subject. In my younger days I fired a locomotive. An engine and train crew can now haul over that division at least four times the tonnage handled by a crew with the equipment of that earlier day. The railway men of America are a picked class, but there is no future for them, unless by legislation they are given a proper share of the benefits of the improvements which are putting them out of work. I personally know enginemen and trainmen who have been losing ground for 20 years or more. The machine is shoving them back all the time and into the discard.

There are two bills on the calendar which have the combined endorsement of more men and women than any two bills which have already been passed in the Seventy-third Congress. That, I know, is a big statement, but I have no more doubt than that I am standing here that that statement is true of the 30-hour week bill for general industry and the 6-hour day bill for the railways. These great bodies of workers have other important bills pending, notably retirement pensions, unemployment insurance and disputes adjustment, but action upon all of them cannot reasonably be expected at this late hour on the calendar. The immediate problem is employment relief. It is easy to philosophize about this situation. Practically everybody agrees that with the growing use and efficiency of the machine the hours of labor must be shortened. But when it comes to reducing philosophy into action we hesitate. I favor taking the bull by the horns. Nothing can be said against these bills that has not been worn threadbare against all their predecessors. We cannot surrender to such considerations. The only thing that should defeat these bills is that we can solve the problem without them. I might oppose to any such contention the pessimistic statement of Clarence Darrow that the 6-hour day will not solve the problem, that the machine will soon overtake it. My answer is that it matters not how short the workday must be. Civilization cannot be made a tramp by the machine. Society must ride the machine or be crushed by it. I believe society can ride the machine, and these bills are contributions to that end. We ought to pass them. [Applause.]

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Is it not a question of either regulating our machine system or letting the machine destroy us? In other words, let us not be machine breakers, but let us make the machine serve man by enacting the 30-hour week and 6-hour day into law.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The able young Representative from Montana has stated the problem in a sentence.

REVENUE ACT OF 1932

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 9234) to amend section 601 (c) (2) of the Revenue Act of 1932.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what this bill is about?

Mr. DOUGHTON. This bill provides for an exemption from the existing excise tax of 3 cents a pound on liquid malt, malt sirup, and malt extract when sold to, or for resale to, a baker or for use in baking, or for resale to a manufacturer or producer of malted milk and medicinal products.

This bill has a unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means and it was also recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the present law, unless sold directly, the tax applies. This bill provides for an exemption when it is resold, the same as sold directly. It covers manufacturers, bakers, and so forth. The committee report is complete and is a unanimous report by the committee. I think the bill is meritorious.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Has the gentleman conferred with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], the senior minority member of the committee, about bringing up this bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will yield, I will answer the question.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I talked to the ranking minority member, and I may say that he had information that it would come up and offered no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. My understanding is there was no objection to bringing it up at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. At present the Government receives a tax when these commodities are sold, whether for resale or otherwise?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They are exempt from tax when sold direct.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the present law?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; under the present law. This proposes to put them on the same basis in either case.

Mr. BLANTON. Just what particular industry does this bill propose to help?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The bakers mainly.

Mr. BLANTON. How about the brewers? The malt-extract provision in the bill is particularly designed, also, to help brewers, is it not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I say to the gentleman from Texas that it will help the manufacturers and producers of malt everywhere in the country.

Mr. BLANTON. That embraces beer.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; but the malt used in beer is not involved in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the beer industry is not involved in the bill at all?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; only indirectly. It does not enter into this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. What particular industry, other than bakers, is this bill designed to help?

Mr. DIRKSEN. All of the malt industries. May I touch on the foundation for the introduction of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I will not require the gentleman to do that, since the bill has the approval of our Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That section 601 (c) (2) of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, is amended by striking out "sold to a baker" and inserting in lieu thereof "sold to, or for resale to, a baker", and by striking out "to a manufacturer or producer" and inserting in lieu thereof "to, or for resale to, a manufacturer or producer."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, with a view to making another unanimous-consent request later.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this morning there was made public throughout the land a report from the Board of Review of the N.R.A. It is a quite extensive report and has been made after an investigation involving months of time. I think the report should be either printed as a public document or printed in the RECORD, and I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the Board of Review of the N.R.A. be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in addition to my own remarks attendant thereon.

Mr. O'CONNOR and Mr. BLANTON objected.

Mr. BRITTEN. This is a Democratic board—this is the Roosevelt-Darrow board.

Mr. BLANTON. What are you after it for?

Mr. BRITTEN. I want it preserved as a valuable document for future reading by those interested in political science. It may later prove to be a most valuable directing force toward correcting the outstanding abuses permitted under the N.R.A.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, my time is not yet up. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was extolling the President a while ago and stating what he would do for him. This is the Roosevelt-Darrow report and should be printed.

Mr. BLANTON. I am backing the President.

SENIOR CIRCUIT JUDGES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 7356) an act to provide, in case of the disability of senior circuit judges, for the exercise of their powers and the performance of their duties by the other circuit judges, and concur in a very unimportant but necessary Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 4, after the word "illness", insert "or other cause."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if he has consulted the minority members of the committee about bringing the matter up at this time?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I have not.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Then I must object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment or is the gentleman going to object in any event?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think the minority members of the committee should be consulted before making such a unanimous-consent request, and I am going to object until I can consult some of the members of the committee.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think that is the correct procedure.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object, Mr. Speaker.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. To submit a unanimous consent request. I think the Darrow report should be printed, but I think in all fairness——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit this request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. My request is that the Darrow report, together with the Johnson reply thereto, be printed in parallel columns in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter in the control of the Joint Committee on Printing, in any event.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

VALIDITY OF DECLARATIONS OF INTENTION

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 8317, to extend the validity of declarations of intention beyond 7 years.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the committee, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7088, to amend the provisions of laws relating to appointment of postmasters.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. JENKINS of Ohio, and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts objected.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Michigan withhold their objection for a statement?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withhold my objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, on the other side of the Capitol the accusation has been made that former Secretary of War Hurley is using his offices to perpetuate Republicans in office. I do not want to enter into that controversy, but I wish to make the statement that this bill is to save money for the Government——

Mr. TABER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOEPPEL. And the objection the Republicans are now making is nothing but a political maneuver to perpetuate their own postmasters in office.

Mr. TABER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. JENKINS of Ohio, and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts objected.

NINTH PAN AMERICAN SANITARY CONFERENCE

The Clerk called the next joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 59, to provide for the expenses of delegates of the United States to the Ninth Pan American Sanitary Conference.

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. TRUAX, Mr. LAMNECK, and Mr. YOUNG objected.

RESPONSIBILITY OF MAIL CONTRACTORS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 7299, to authorize the Post Office Department to hold contractors responsible in damages for the loss, rifling, damage, wrong delivery, depredation upon, or other mistreatment of mail matter due to fault or negligence of the contractor or an agent or employee thereof.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3962 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of May 11, 1926 (44 Stat. 499; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 443), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of contractors for failure to perform service according to contract and impose fines upon them for other delinquencies, which deductions or fines may be changed or remitted, in his discretion. Contractors shall also be answerable in damages to the United States for the proper care and transportation of the mails, and be accountable to the United States for any loss or damage resulting to any of such mail or any part of it by reason of the failure to exercise due care on the part of any of the contractor's officers, agents, or employees in the custody, handling, or transportation thereof. He may deduct the price of the trip in all cases where the trip is not performed and not exceeding three times the price if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the contractor or carrier."

RESPONSIBILITY OF RAILROAD COMPANIES CARRYING THE MAILS

The Clerk called the next bill on the calendar, H.R. 7392, to authorize the Post Office Department to hold railroad companies responsible in damages for the loss, rifling, damage, wrong delivery, depredation upon, or other mistreatment of mail matter due to fault or negligence of the railroad company or an agent or employee thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana). Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, I wish some member of the committee would explain why this bill is necessary, now that the bill H.R. 7299 has been passed? I have no particular objection to it, but it appears to me that this is included in the bill that we have just passed, H.R. 7299.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. This bill has to do with the contractors, and the other one had to do with the common carriers.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is there any particular reason why they should have two bills?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. This bill under consideration has to do with the contract carriers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FADDIS, Mr. LAMNECK, and Mr. KURTZ objected.

TO AMEND THE LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 8057, to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act with respect to rates of compensation, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I objected to this bill at the last call, because I wanted an opportunity to study it. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is familiar with it, and I should like to have him make an explanation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this bill, introduced by Mr. BOYLAN, of New York, which has been unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee through Mr. CELLER, of New York, and for which a rule has been granted, has been put on the Consent Calendar. There being no objection to it by anybody whom I know, it is my thought that we might pass it by unanimous consent and save the time which would be taken under the rule.

In 1927 we passed the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. The longshoremen in the different States were not protected by State compensation laws because they were engaged in foreign commerce or in commerce not entirely within the States. So it became necessary to pass a Federal compensation law for longshoremen and harbor workers. I was privileged to take a part in the passage of that act of July 1, 1927.

In administering that law, however, certain defects arose, which this present bill proposes to correct. This bill provides for six amendments to the law, all agreed upon in the first instance by the workers, by the employers, and by the United States Compensation Commission.

FIRST AMENDMENT

Section 1 of H.R. 8057 adds a new sentence to section 7 (a) of the existing act. It authorizes a deputy commissioner to suspend payment of compensation if the injured employee unreasonably refuses to submit to medical and surgical treatment. The United States Employees' Compensation Commission in its Seventeenth Annual Report (June 30, 1933, pp. 18–19) states:

> Deputy commissioners have found it difficult in a number of cases to make awards which properly protect the interest of the employer, due to the failure of the employee to carry out the entirely proper instructions of the physician or surgeon treating his case, and in some cases due to the deliberate acts of the employee in removing bandages or doing other things which clearly increase the period of disability.

The proposed amendment is in line with the recommendations of the Commission.

SECOND AMENDMENT

Section 2 of H.R. 8057 amends subdivision (c) of section 8 of the existing act so as to provide that in case of permanent partial disability—for example, the loss of an arm—compensation shall first be paid during the "healing period" and that such payments shall be in addition to the compensation payable on account of the permanent partial disability as fixed in the schedule, paragraphs (1) to (12) of section 8 (c).

This amendment sets forth clearly the intentions of those who drafted the original act. Subsequent court interpretations have resulted in some confusion and unexpected injustice. (Texas Employers Ins. Assn. v. Sheppeard, 32 Fed. (2d) 300; Texas Employers Ins. Assn. v. Sheppeard, Eq. No. 375 in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Houston Division; Baltimore & Philadelphia Steamboat Co. et al. v. Norton et al., 40 Fed. (2d) 530, 48 Fed. (2d) 57, and 284 U.S. 408; Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Co. v. Pillsbury, 54 Fed. (2d) 1077.) The United States Employees' Compensation Commission describes the result of these decisions in its latest annual report (pp. 16–17) as follows:

> Among other things it may be pointed out that under the interpretation placed upon section 8 (c) (22) an injured employee who suffers a prolonged period of temporary total disability followed by a permanent partial disability consisting of a small percentage of loss of use of a member in many cases could not be awarded as much compensation for his entire disability, both temporary total and permanent, as he would be clearly entitled to have awarded him for his temporary total disability alone if he had had no ensuing permanent partial disability.

The Commission recommends an amendment "to correct this situation and avoid the incongruous and harsh results of such interpretation as well as to assure compensation in all cases for the disability actually suffered." The amendment proposed in section 2 of H.R. 8057 is in line with this recommendation.

THIRD AMENDMENT

The second amendment, above described, would result in a definite increase in compensation cost to the employers under the act were it not for the third amendment, as follows: Section 2 of H.R. 8057 amends section 8 (c) of the act by reducing the number of scheduled weeks of compensation payable for permanent partial disabilities in paragraphs (1) to (12). In each instance the reduction proposed is equal to the number of weeks of compensation specified in the present "healing-period" clause, section 8 (c) (22), which is repealed by this bill. This amendment, taken together with the previous amendment, constitutes a compromise which corrects injustices without increasing the cost to the employer.

FOURTH AMENDMENT

Section 3 of H.R. 8057 substitutes for the existing paragraph (22) of section 8 (c)—which is in effect repealed by the second and third amendments above—a new subdivision which makes it possible, in cases where a worker loses more than one member listed in the schedule—for example, a finger and a thumb—to pay compensation on account of each member lost. Such separate, consecutive awards are not possible under the existing act. This amendment is identical with that recommended by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission in its latest annual report (p. 17).

FIFTH AMENDMENT

Section 4 of H.R. 8057 amends section 14 (j) of the act so as to authorize the deputy commissioner to make partial lump-sum settlements. At present, lump-sum settlements, when made, must be for the entire amount of the compensation due. The Commission in its Seventeenth Annual Report (p. 17) states:

> Deputy commissioners who have had occasion to apply this section have expressed the opinion that in many cases partial lump-sum settlements would be for the best interests of a person entitled to compensation although there is not sufficient justification for commuting the entire amount due into one payment.

This amendment is in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission. However, the Judiciary Committee added two additional safeguards before a partial lump-sum settlement can be made: (1) It can be made only upon the claimant's application and (2) then only with approval of the Commission.

The amendment also provides that in computing the lump sum payable to a widow, the probability of her remarriage shall be taken into consideration. Computations are to be made upon the basis of the remarriage tables of the Dutch Royal Insurance Institution, as is provided in the New York compensation law and in accordance with practice generally, since these are widely recognized as the authoritative tables for this purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Say that a man loses a finger and a thumb. Does the fourth amendment provide that he shall then receive for the loss of the two members as much as he would for the loss of a whole hand?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no. The present law provides a certain number of weeks for the loss of a finger and a certain number of weeks for the loss of a thumb; but in the interpretation of the law it was held, because the statute was not clear, that where a man suffered both of those injuries, for instance, he was not entitled to compensation for both losses. The amendment takes care of that situation.

Mr. BLANTON. All of the beneficiaries of the United States Compensation Act are employees of the Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No. Of course, these are not.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about those outside of the longshoremen.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There may be others.

Mr. BLANTON. Are there any others besides the longshoremen?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been wondering how they, with a status not that of a Government employee, got into the United States Compensation Act to begin with.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Because they could not get in under any State act.

Mr. BLANTON. They are not employees of the United States Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the employees and employers contribute, of course, to the fund to provide the compensation.

Mr. BLANTON. They are not employees of the United States Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They are not paid by the United States Government. The compensation fund is merely administered by this Employees' Compensation Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. But all of the machinery and overhead is furnished by the United States Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know about that; the contributions may cover that overhead, but the employers contribute to the loss. The Government does not.

Mr. BLANTON. I am hopeful that we will watch this matter and not let it be enlarged from time to time, because, the first thing you know, you will have the United States Government looking after everything that the States ought to look after; and whenever anybody takes anything from the United States Government they may as well understand that they are giving away some valuable rights in return. The people everywhere are depending entirely too much upon the United States Government for everything.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The present law provides that the employees contribute to private insurance companies to provide for paying disabilities.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the overhead and all of the administrative machinery, which is furnished by the United States Government.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am particularly interested in the feature that allows those injured a longer period to come back and reopen the thing. That is the real feature of the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is provided for in the sixth amendment.

Mr. McFARLANE. Are there any limitations on this compensation law as to how much the attorney shall receive for representing parties?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am quite sure that such a limitation is in the original act of July 1, 1927.

Mr. McFARLANE. That is not covered in this bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. This bill merely carries certain amendments to the act of 1927.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, there is an identical Senate bill, S. 2794, introduced by Senator LA FOLLETTE, on the Speaker's table, which has passed the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask something about the provisions for a reduction in the number of weeks of pay and the reason for reducing the amount.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is the third amendment. The number of weeks' compensation is reduced there because of the previous amendment which allows compensation during a preliminary or "healing period", but the total compensation remains the same, without any reduction to the injured employee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then there is not any actual reduction in the amount a man will receive?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection for the reason that I have a letter here from the Maritime Employers' Association objecting to the bill. I think it is a good bill because of that objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill S. 2794?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the Senate bill S. 2974.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (a) of section 7 of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "If at any time during such period the employee unreasonably refuses to submit to medical or surgical treatment, the deputy commissioner may, by order, suspend the payment of further compensation during such time as such refusal continues, and no compensation shall be paid at any time during the period of such suspension, unless the circumstances justified the refusal."

SEC. 2. So much of subdivision (c) of section 8 of such act, as amended, as precedes paragraph (13) thereof is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Permanent partial disability: In case of disability partial in character but permanent in quality, the compensation shall be 66⅔ percent of the average weekly wages, which shall be in addition to compensation for temporary total disability paid in accordance with subdivision (b) of this section, and shall be paid to the employee, as follows:

"(1) Arm lost, 280 weeks' compensation.
"(2) Leg lost, 248 weeks' compensation.
"(3) Hand lost, 212 weeks' compensation.
"(4) Foot lost, 173 weeks' compensation.
"(5) Eye lost, 140 weeks' compensation.
"(6) Thumb lost, 51 weeks' compensation.
"(7) First finger lost, 28 weeks' compensation.
"(8) Great toe lost, 26 weeks' compensation.
"(9) Second finger lost, 18 weeks' compensation.
"(10) Third finger lost, 17 weeks' compensation.
"(11) Toe other than great toe lost, 8 weeks' compensation.
"(12) Fourth finger lost, 7 weeks' compensation."

SEC. 3. Paragraph (22) of subdivision (c) of section 8 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(22) In any case in which there shall be a loss of, or loss of use of, more than one member or parts of more than one member set forth in paragraphs (1) to (19) of this subdivision, not amounting to permanent total disability, the award of compensation shall be for the loss of, or loss of use of, each such member or part thereof, which awards shall run consecutively."

SEC. 4. Subdivision (j) of section 14 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(j) Whenever the deputy commissioner determines that it is in the interest of justice, the liability of the employer for compensation, or any part thereof as determined by the deputy commissioner with the approval of the Commission, may be discharged by the payment of a lump sum equal to the present value of future compensation payments commuted, computed at 4 percent true discount compounded annually. The probability of the death of the injured employee or other person entitled to compensation before the expiration of the period during which he is entitled to compensation shall be determined in accordance with the American Experience Table of Mortality, and the probability of the remarriage of the surviving wife shall be determined in accordance with the remarriage tables of the Dutch Royal Insurance Institution. The probability of the happening of any other contingency affecting the amount or duration of the compensation shall be disregarded."

SEC. 5. Section 22 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"MODIFICATION OF COMPENSATION CASES

"SEC. 22. Upon his own initiative, or upon the application of any party in interest, on the ground of a change in conditions or because of a mistake in a determination of fact by the deputy commissioner, the deputy commissioner may, at any time prior to 1 year after the date of the last payment of compensation, whether or not a compensation order has been issued, review a compensation case in accordance with the procedure prescribed in respect of claims in section 19, and in accordance with such section issue a new compensation order which may terminate, continue, reinstate, increase, or decrease such compensation. Such new order shall not affect any compensation previously paid, except that an award increasing the compensation rate may be made effective from the date of the injury, and if any part of the compensation due or to become due is unpaid, an award decreasing the compensation rate may be made effective from the date of the injury, and any payment made prior thereto in excess of such decreased rate shall be deducted from any unpaid compensation, in such manner and by such method as may be determined by the deputy commissioner with the approval of the Commission."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H.R. 8057, was laid on the table.

CARGOES IN AMERICAN-FLAG VESSELS

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 282, requiring 50 percent of the cargo imported and exported under trade agreements between the United States and foreign nations to be carried in vessels of the United States.

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object to that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

PAYMENT OF CONSULAR OFFICERS OR AGENTS AT FOREIGN PORTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5266, to amend section 4548 (U.S.C., title 46, sec. 605) of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, the Treasury Department recommends that this bill be not enacted; that it is unnecessary; that it is simply a reiteration of existing statutes already on the books. Therefore I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman reserve the objection? The statute requires payment in gold. While the Treasury Department does make that recommendation, it formerly recommended that this bill ought to pass. This simply brings it in line with the present policy of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. But the present administration, through our Treasury Department, objects to the bill, and I am backing the administration. Therefore I object. There will be two other objections, which are necessary to stop the bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Both the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary objected. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three objections are required.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2046, to provide relief for disbursing officers of the Army in certain cases.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object to that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold the objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I understand that the Committee on Military Affairs has taken notice of the argument I presented against this bill last week, and the committee has unanimously instructed the chairman to request the committee to file a supplemental report with an amendment which will take care of the situation. Pending that, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will let the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the consideration of the bill.

TOUR OF DUTY IN THE TROPICS BY OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8567, to amend the laws relating to the length of tours of duty in the Tropics and certain foreign stations in the case of officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that Senate 3397 be substituted for this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it an identical bill?

Mr. SPENCE. It is an identical bill, except that the Senate bill gives to the Secretary some additional power, except in the discretion of the Secretary of War for definite emergency.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I think the gentleman's request that the Senate bill be substituted is subject to a point of order at this time, because consideration of the bill has not been consented to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the House bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, I want the gentleman to explain the difference between the Senate bill and the House bill. I have no particular objection to the bill providing section 2 is amended to conform to the wishes of the War Department, and I have been informed that the Senate bill does that.

Mr. SPENCE. The Senate bill conforms to the wishes of both the War Department and the Navy Department. They both agreed it would be well for the bill to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objecion.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 3397 be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 (requiring assignments of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps to permanent duty in the Tropics and at certain foreign stations to be for not less than 3 years) of the Treasury and Post Office Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1934, approved March 3, 1933 (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 10, sec. 17a), is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. The second and third provisos in the paragraph with the heading "Barracks and Quarters, Philippine Islands" in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916", approved March 4, 1915 (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 10, sec. 17) are hereby amended to read as follows: "No officer or enlisted man of the Army shall, except upon his own request, be required to serve in a single tour of duty for more than 2 years in the Philippine Islands, on the Asiatic station, or in China, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, or the Panama Canal Zone, except in case of insurrection or of actual or threatened hostilities and except in the discretion of the Secretary of War for temporary emergencies: Provided, That the foregoing provision shall not apply to the organization known as the 'Philippine Scouts.'"

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOEPPEL to the Senate bill: Page 2, line 16, after the word "Scouts", add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. No recruit with less than 6 months' service shall be assigned to duty outside the United States except in the discretion of the Secretary of War in case of threatened or actual emergency."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman wants to speak on the amendment.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I should like to speak on the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order on the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered is almost exactly in accordance with the thought expressed to me by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House [Mr. McSWAIN].

I was present in the Senate in the closing days of the "lame duck" session in 1932 when the Senate passed the bill forcing our officers and men to remain 3 years in the Tropics. As only bills of an emergency nature were considered in the special session immediately following, there was no opportunity in that session to secure the repeal of the iniquitous 3-year tenure of service law.

On the first day of the first regular session of the present Congress, I introduced a bill repealing the 3-year tenure of service without imposing any restrictions whatever upon the War and Navy Departments. Two months later, the bill under discussion was introduced. My bill was accorded a hearing and was approved by the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs. After the subcommittee had approved my bill, I spoke to the chairman of the committee [Mr. McSWAIN], requesting a hearing by the full committee and he then indicated that he favored an amendment such as I have introduced. At the next meeting of the full committee, I was present but was informed that the meeting would be an executive one and I departed. During my absence, the Spence bill was substituted for my bill without having had any report whatever from the War Department on its provisions. Subsequently, the War Department reported adversely to the second section of the bill under discussion because of the mandatory provisions therein which thus will add to the problem of administration and which also will tend to tie the hands of the War Department.

I am in favor of the bill we are considering, even though I am not its author, since it differs from my bill only in the matter of administration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill was reported by the committee. Did the gentleman present this amendment to the committee?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I did not because of the fact that the full committee held a hearing and reported the Spence bill without giving me an opportunity to appear before the committee to advance the provisions of my bill in comparison with the Spence bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I take it the amendment offered by the gentleman has had no consideration whatever by the committee.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The only consideration it can be said to have had is what might be inferred from the expression of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

Mr. BLANTON. I am opposed to any change of the law relating to the Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps until the proposed change has been carefully considered and passed upon by the proper legislative committee.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Answering the gentleman, he then must be opposed to this bill we are now discussing because the War Department, while it is in favor of the 2-year tenure of service, is officially on record as opposed to the mandatory provisions as carried in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the lack of opportunity for the committee to pass upon the gentleman's amendment. The gentleman admits that his amendment has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes; that is true, primarily because of the fact that I was not called before the committee, as I should have been, and also because of the fact that the whole committee reported this bill in the absence of the chairman, Mr. McSWAIN.

Mr. BLANTON. Then it ought not to pass until the committee considers it.

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would suggest that the gentleman withdraw his amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I do, Mr. Speaker.

Answering the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], I wish to state that I am as much interested in this bill as is he or his colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE]. It is a very meritorious bill. Any Member of Congress who has had military experience in the Tropics or who has visited the Tropics should realize that to vote against this bill would be absolutely inhuman.

In my amendment I wish to prevent the sending of young recruits abroad in the Foreign Service. When they are sent out in the Foreign Service, they are isolated; they are torn, in a sense, from their loved ones and in a foreign atmosphere, they must submit to rigid discipline which breaks them down physically as well as mentally in many instances. On the boat on which I returned from Honolulu last summer were 41 mental cases, 12 of whom were in strait-jackets. We should not permit an act of Congress to force our American youth to serve long periods in alien lands. We should regard the interest of the families of the officers and men and enact this bill and this amendment from the standpoint of humane consideration. It will also be an economic advantage to the Nation inasmuch as the retirements because of physical disability and pensions because of breakdown will be reduced to a minimum.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order but is arguing his amendment on its merits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from California is addressing himself to the point of order. The gentleman from California will proceed.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my Republican colleagues have been so very kind and gentle to me this afternoon in opposing a bill of mine which would release Republican postmasters at the expiration of their terms of office, I will not argue the point with the gentleman from New Jersey. As I am so vitally interested and anxious to see this bill enacted into law, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment so that the bill may be enacted now instead of being sent back to the Senate for reconsideration which might result in its defeat because of the stress of business in the closing days of the session. Even though it carries obnoxious mandatory provisions of which the War Department has disapproved, I accept it nevertheless because it will repeal the law establishing 3-year tenure of service in the Tropics.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I understood when unanimous consent was granted to consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill that the two bills were identical.

Mr. SPENCE. They are, except as to one sentence, to which I called attention.

Mr. GOSS. As I understood the reading of the Senate bill by the Clerk, it omitted the reference to the Navy and the Marine Corps included in the House bill.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman from Connecticut that the Senate bill is identical with the House bill with the exception that in the Senate bill, after the word "hostilities" which appears on line 10 of page 2 of the House bill, the Senate has added "and except in the discretion of the Secretary of War for temporary emergency."

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman admits that the Senate bill is not identical with the House bill. As I am pointing out the House bill included enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, whereas the Senate bill, as I understood its reading by the Clerk, did not refer to the Navy and the Marine Corps.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut misunderstood the situation because the gentleman from Kentucky, in answer to my inquiry, pointed out when he asked to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, that there was this difference in the two bills.

Mr. GOSS. The matter to which I am referring is the apparent omission of the reference to the Navy and Marine Corps.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. They are included in the Senate bill.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the section of the Senate bill may be again read by the Clerk. I have not the Senate bill before me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the first section of the Senate bill.

The Clerk again read section 1 of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN THE CANAL ZONE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8173, authorizing the President to make rules and regulations in respect to alcoholic beverages in the Canal Zone, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, to that I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio and Mr. BLANTON objected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, upon the strength of a statement just made to me by the gentleman from California, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection but reserve the right to object for the purpose of giving the gentleman from California an opportunity to explain the bill.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, there is now no law whatever regulating or controlling the liquor business in the Panama Canal Zone.

The administration desires this bill in order that the President may pass regulations controlling the transportation, possession, and sale of liquor in the Panama Canal Zone. Today it is unregulated and unrestrained, and this is a situation we should be interested in trying to improve.

Mr. BLANTON. On the gentleman's statement, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there any reason why we cannot legislate on this subject?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I had previously objected.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the objection stage has passed. The Speaker had ordered the Clerk to read the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I contend the Speaker had no right to proceed in that way.

Mr. BLANTON. There were only two objectors.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not object until the Chair had ordered the Clerk to read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that he had ordered the reading of the bill before all three objections were made.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, then I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But in view of the fact there are now three objections, the Chair will recognize that fact and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in view of the ruling I withdraw the point of no quorum.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7667, to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEHLBACH, Mr. WELCH, and Mr. CARTER objected.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8513, to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the birthplace and boyhood home of Gen. Thomas J. (Stonewall) Jackson.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire whether this is really intended as a memorial to Stonewall Jackson, or as some kind of a racket out of which people may make money?

Mr. EDMISTON. The proceeds from the sale of these coins will go to the State 4-H camp in West Virginia.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I notice in the bill it is provided that these coins may be purchased only from the Treasury Department by one particular corporation.

Mr. EDMISTON. To be appointed by the Governor of our State.

Mr. GRISWOLD. They can only be purchased from the Treasury Department by one particular corporation at par. No one else has the right to acquire these coins from the Treasury Department except this one corporation and we are authorizing the issuance of $25,000 of these coins.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. What will be the price at which these 50-cent pieces will be purchased?

Mr. EDMISTON. One dollar.

Mr. TRUAX. Who makes the money?

Mr. EDMISTON. The profit goes to the State 4-H camp.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three objections are required.

There being no further objections the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the birthplace and boyhood home of Gen. Thomas J. (Stonewall) Jackson, there shall be coined in the mints of the United States silver 50-cent pieces to the number of 50,000, such pieces to be of standard troy weight, composition, diameter, and design as shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, which said 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment of their face value.

SEC. 2. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of the coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for security of the coin or for any other purpose, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to coinage herein authorized.

SEC. 3. The coins authorized by this act shall be issued only to the director of the State 4-H camp at Jacksons Mill, W.Va., upon payment of the face value of such coins.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 3, strike out the words "birthplace and."

Page 1, line 5, after the word "States", insert the words "fifty thousand."

Page 1, line 6, after the word "pieces" strike out the words "to the number of fifty thousand, such pieces to be."

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "and approved by" and insert "with approval of."

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Treasury" strike out the words "which said 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment of their face value" and insert "but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models for master dies or other preparations for this coinage."

"SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall be issued at par and only upon the request of the commission authorized by the Governor of the State of West Virginia."

Page 2, line 16, strike out all of section 3 and amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the boyhood home of Gen. Thomas J. (Stonewall) Jackson."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NAVAL AIR STATION, PENSACOLA, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1103, to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with certain public works at the naval air station, Pensacola, Fla.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill provides an authorization of $5,363,000 for the purpose of constructing buildings, roads, utilities, and removing, relocating, replacing, remodeling, and extending existing buildings, structures, roads, utilities, and appurtenances at the naval air station at Pensacola, Fla. The amount originally requested was $6,955,000. There is no recommendation here from the Navy Department.

Mr. CARTER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. CARTER of California. May I inform the gentleman that I am going to request that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. I will inform the gentleman that I shall object to his request.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I may state to the gentleman from Ohio that this bill was thoroughtly considered by the Naval Affairs Committee, and the measure has a unanimous report from the committee. I trust the gentleman will not force the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER] to object, but will permit the bill to go over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. I am willing to withdraw my objection and let the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman let the bill go over without prejudice?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AQUATIC PRODUCTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9233, authorizing associations of producers of aquatic products.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I reserve the right to object for a brief statement by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. The statement I want to make is simply that this bill provides for the same relief for the fishermen that has already been given to the farmers. There is no change in the law except it is made applicable to fishermen. Their desperate condition throughout the country, as well as their desire to organize in order to better themselves, is the basis of this legislation.

Mr. TRUAX. Does this bill apply mainly to deep-sea fishermen or to fresh-water fishermen as well?

Mr. BLAND. It applies to all classes of fishermen.

Mr. TRUAX. And I presume the gentleman is referring to commercial fishing?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; all classes of commercial fishing.

Mr. TRUAX. And the bill provides they may organize cooperative marketing associations?

Mr. BLAND. Just as the farmers may do now.

Mr. TRUAX. If the cooperative associations that the gentleman proposes to form under this bill are no more successful in obtaining higher prices for the industry than the farm cooperatives have been in securing higher prices for farm products, I shall not withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BLAND. We just want an opportunity to try it, that is all.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; but we have tried this for 15 years and the prices are getting lower day by day.

Still reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman another question. I happen to know something about commercial fishing in the Great Lakes. At one time I was chairman of the Great Lakes Conservation Council of Commercial Fishermen. At no time in my career have I ever received a request for consideration or a request to support a measure of this kind and I should like to ask the gentleman where the bill originated and from what set of commercial fishermen it comes.

Mr. BLAND. It proceeded from a number of bills that were considered for the rehabilitation of the industry. I introduced the bill myself as the basis of the consideration that had been given by gentlemen connected with the fisheries industry, not connected with the N.R.A.

Mr. TRUAX. Who were the gentlemen?

Mr. BLAND. One of them is Mr. Fielder, who is connected with the Bureau of Fisheries and at present is Deputy Administrator of the Fisheries Code.

Mr. TRUAX. Then the bill comes from the Bureau of Fisheries and not from the fishermen themselves?

Mr. BLAND. No; it comes from me individually, as a result of studies by me.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. If the gentleman will permit, I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that the request comes largely from the fishermen themselves. I have had letters from outstanding fishermen along the New England coast, including oyster growers and people engaged in all branches of deep-sea fishing, urging the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from Ohio that down the Potomac River and all along the Chesapeake Bay there are some of the finest men to be found anywhere in the world engaged in fishing. That is their means of earning a living. I know a number of them personally. They are dependent on fishing for their meat and bread, and, certainly, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] has said, they should have the right to do the same thing that the farmers of Ohio and Texas have been granted the right to do by the Members of Congress. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. TRUAX. The farmers of Ohio have largely discontinued their efforts along this line. They have seen the fallacy of trying to elevate their prices through cooperative associations. It just cannot be done.

Mr. BLANTON. All the farmers of Ohio are not that kind of men. They do not give up. They are like the farmers of Texas, who still carry on and stand pat.

Mr. TRUAX. No; they stand pat and let them soak them, just as they are doing today.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will not object to this request.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further, and I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that, in my judgment, the bill will not accomplish the end for which it is designed; but in order to give it a chance, I want to hear from the fishermen back in Lake Erie and Ohio, and so I withdraw the objection and ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. That would fix it so that one objection can stop it again next time and means the death of the bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

TO AUTHORIZE THE TOWN OF SEWARD, ALASKA, TO ISSUE BONDS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 9468, authorizing the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $60,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal light and power plant in the town of Seward, Alaska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I objected to this bill at the last call, and it was put over to give an opportunity to offer an amendment that would be fair to private companies.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill?

Mr. GOSS. I object.

TO ESTABLISH A DEPARTMENT OF PHYSICS AT WEST POINT

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, S. 2042, establishing a department of physics at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N.Y.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there is authorized one professor of physics at the United States Military Academy, with the same status, rank, pay, and allowances of other professors at said Military Academy.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTROL OF FLOODS IN SALMON RIVER, ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 5665, authorizing the control of floods in the Salmon River, Alaska.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the project of prevention and control of floods in the Salmon River, Alaska, recommended in the report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in House Document No. 228, Seventy-second Congress, is hereby adopted and authorized and shall be prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers in accordance with the plan recommended in such report and subject to the conditions set forth therein.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, GARRISON, N.DAK.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 9320, to further extend the times for commencement and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N.Dak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER of California. I should like to hear from the author of the bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SUSQUEHANNA RIVER NEAR YORK FURNACE, PA.

The Clerk called the next bill on the calendar, H.R. 9326, granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near York Furnace, York County, Pa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McFARLANE. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear the bill explained, as this is to be a toll bridge.

Mr. HAINES. This is a bridge to be constructed by the State Highway Department of Pennsylvania. There is a distance of 41 miles between Connowingo and Wrightsville, where there is no bridge, and we should like to have a bridge in that fertile territory.

Mr. McFARLANE. Why does not the State build it without making a toll bridge of it, and let the State take care of it?

Mr. HAINES. The State is not in position to do that at the present time.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. I note in the report upon this bill from the Department of Agriculture, that Mr. R. G. Tugwell, Acting Secretary, says that the bill is without objection, so far as this Department is concerned. Therefore I suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw his objection. I said the other day that in my judgment Dr. Tugwell knew more about bridge than he did about agriculture, but the reporters in some way misheard and it got into the RECORD that he knew more about bridges than about agriculture. In my judgment the good doctor knows more about bridge than he does about the job he is now occupying, and if he recommends this, I think it should go through.

Mr. McFARLANE. I withdraw my objection on that explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Susquehanna River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near York Furnace, York County, Pa., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of tolls shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of tolls shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near York Furnace, Pa."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SUSQUEHANNA RIVER, NEAR MIDDLETOWN, PA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9401, granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Middletown, Dauphin County, Pa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, acting through its department of highways, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the Susquehanna River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Middletown, Dauphin County, and between Middletown, Dauphin County, and Goldsboro, York County, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3374, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across Lake Champlain from East Alburg, Vt., to West Swanton, Vt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlemen withhold their objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I withhold my objection.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I reserve mine.

Mr. PLUMLEY. It is quite important and necessary, so far as the State of Vermont is concerned, that if this bill is to be enacted, it become a law prior to the 15th of June. This is one of two bridges necessary to complete a chain of bridges.

Mr. TRUAX. This is a private toll bridge, is it not?

Mr. PLUMLEY. It is not. The State of Vermont is interested in the bill and the Federal Government has recommended it.

Mr. TRUAX. But the Federal Government recommends against it.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. TRUAX. Oh, yes. I call the gentleman's attention to the report.

Mr. PLUMLEY. It is under a misapprehension then.

Mr. TRUAX. I call the gentleman's attention to the report of Mr. Rexford Tugwell, Acting Secretary of Agriculture. He says:

> Furthermore, this will be a private toll bridge at a point where it is not believed such a bridge should be constructed. The Department, therefore, recommends against favorable action on this bill.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Will the gentleman accept my statement that it is a Federal——

Mr. TRUAX. But I want to follow Mr. Tugwell; and I say that without any disrespect to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. It is necessary, so far as the State of Vermont is concerned. The State of Vermont has undertaken the purchase of the road.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think if the gentleman can get a statement from Mr. Tugwell straightening this matter out there will be no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Is there a ferry there now?

Mr. PLUMLEY. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Did I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he is following Mr. Tugwell on all matters?

Mr. TRUAX. Not on all matters; only on bridge matters.

Mr. FADDIS. What would be the difference between putting in a toll bridge and having a ferry already in existence? Is not a bridge better than a ferry?

Mr. TRUAX. Not a private toll bridge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I am following the gentleman to whom I referred on bridge matters. I object.

DONATION OF CERTAIN ARMY EQUIPMENT TO AMERICAN LEGION

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1328, to provide for the donation of certain Army equipment to posts of the American Legion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes.

Mr. MAY. This bill provides for the delivery or surrender by the War Department to the American Legion posts of obsolete guns. The Secretary of War says that it will cost more to recover them than they are worth, and they have no objection.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The only reason that I ask that this be passed over without prejudice is that I may be allowed further opportunity to look into the matter. I do not see why the Government wants to relinquish its claim on the property and have no control over it whatsoever, particularly where it may be used for bad purposes in some instances.

Mr. MAY. The only purpose the Legion post uses it for is to fire salutes at funerals of dead comrades. The War Department makes a specific report that they have no objection to it.

The cost of recovering them would be more than they are worth.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Some American Legion posts use these guns to break strikes, do they not?

Mr. MAY. Well, suppose they do?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Suppose they did—then I would object.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I should like to state that these American Legion posts procured, under this law, 12 rifles. They are all obsolete. They placed a bond with the Government for $1,000, for 12 rifles that are worth about 39 cents each. The only place you could procure ammunition for those rifles is from the American Government, and they do not make any ball cartridges any more for those rifles. So it is all blank ammunition.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman have sufficient confidence in the American Legion to know that the posts, taking the rank and file of them, are not going to permit anything improper, such as the gentleman has in mind, to happen?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I know, as a matter of fact, that in my part of the country they do not do those things, but in different parts of the country I know where the American Legion has been used for breaking strikes, and nothing else.

Mr. BLANTON. But the American Legion posts in good standing are all loyal to the flag and to the country.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. As a general thing; yes.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I want to know if the gentleman desires to put himself in the position of objecting to 10,000 Legion posts having these materials which the War Department says are worthless, because somewhere somebody might do something wrong?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Let me have the gentleman understand that I did not object. I asked that this go over without prejudice so that I might look into it a little further.

Mr. BLANTON. But that means it cannot pass this session.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But they have the guns already, have they not? The Government has not asked for their return, has it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is the custom for these posts to carry a bond running to the United States Government, that amounts to more than the rifles are worth. If this bill goes over, every post will have to produce another bond, which will cost 6 or 7 dollars each. Ten thousand posts means 60 or 70 thousand dollars for bonds.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Regular order is demanded.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Well, Mr. Speaker, let us have this out right now. I make a point of no quorum.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The gentleman should not get excited.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am getting excited at the gentleman's reflection on the American Legion posts. I am excited.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman has not objected. He has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Does the gentleman want to go on record that the American Legion is nothing but a bunch of strike-breakers?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I resent that insult to the American Legion posts.

Mr. FADDIS. And so do I.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I want to have this out right now. If the gentleman objects, I am going to make a point of no quorum.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Well, who has objected? I have not.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Washington has not objected. He withdrew his request.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. But, in effect, he is objecting, because his request will prevent consideration of this bill.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the gentleman will listen he will find out that I have not objected. He should pay a little attention to what goes on and not jump at conclusions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the gentleman from Oregon would only vote for the veterans instead of making speeches, it would be better.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I vote for the veterans. You are the bird who is against all patriotic societies.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Am I? What foundation has the warrior from Oregon for such a statement? Just because I do not vote as the gentleman does on most occasions he should not burst forth in childish wrath as now, for I cannot vote as he does.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no Member of this House is a bird. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to give to each post of the American Legion to which obsolete or condemned Army rifles, slings, or cartridge belts have been loaned under authority of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to loan Army rifles to posts of the American Legion", approved February 10, 1920, as amended, any such equipment now held by such post, and to cancel and release all obligations to the United States incurred pursuant to such act in connection with loans of such equipment to posts of the American Legion.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9322, to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

DIKE ACROSS CAMAS SLOUGH ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9434, granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a dike or dam across the head of Camas Slough (Washougal Slough) to Lady Island on the Columbia River in the State of Washington.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Crown Willamette Paper Co., of Portland, Oreg., to construct a dike or dam across Camas Slough (Washougal Slough) at a point near the mouth of Washougal River to Lady Island, State of Washington: Provided, That the work of constructing this dike or dam shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been filed with and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States: And provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the use of such dike or dam to develop water power or generate hydroelectric energy.

SEC. 2. The authority granted by this act shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of said dike or dam hereby authorized is commenced within 1 year and completed within 3 years from the date of approval of this act.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "War", insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That in approving the plans for said dike or dam such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTAINERS FOR MUSHROOMS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5522, a bill to amend the Standard Baskets Act of August 31, 1916, to provide for a 1-pound Climax basket for mushrooms.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill, as I understand it, is introduced because of an emergency existing in the mushroom industry. Am I right?

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio withhold his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my objection to permit the gentleman to make an explanation.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, of which I am a member, considered this bill. The purpose of this bill is to amend the standard container act which provides that certain kinds of fruits and vegetables shall be sold in certain measures—quarts, 2 quarts, and so forth. Mushrooms are sold by weight, so it is proposed to amend the standard container act to provide a different size container for the sale of mushrooms.

There is an emergency existing, to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, because the people who sell mushrooms have had some trouble in the courts over the matter of containers, and it is necessary that this bill be passed so they can proceed with their business of selling mushrooms by weight rather than by volume. I may add that Professor Tugwell is agreeable to this proposal.

Mr. TRUAX. I do not care always to follow Tugwell.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman has been following Tugwell in some of the measures today.

Mr. TRUAX. Only on bridges, I beg to inform the gentleman.

Mr. FIESINGER. I think he makes a very reasonable explanation in this case.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further. For 6 years I was director of agriculture of the State of Ohio. During that time we had many, many requests to change the shape and dimensions and the structure of various containers for food. One of the most numerous requests that we had was to change the standard milk bottle. Certain dairies made a specialty of selling a glass of milk in a bottle. They would sell it to high-priced and high-toned clubs where they charge 10 cents for a small glass of milk.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And the hotels.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; and the large hotels, I am reminded by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The Mayflower Hotel?

Mr. TRUAX. No; I am not referring to the Mayflower Hotel, but to hotels back in Ohio. Had we acceded to this request the one or two big fellows would put the little fellows to a great disadvantage because the few big ones who had the fancy trade, the elite trade, could get the same price for a glass of milk that the little dairy farmer gets for a pint of milk. Our law specifies that milk must be sold in half pints, pints, quarts, or multiples thereof.

Mr. FIESINGER. What has that to do with mushrooms?

Mr. TRUAX. It has a lot to do with them. I think we have standard containers now.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mushrooms are sold by weight, not by volume.

Mr. TRUAX. I am well aware of that.

Mr. FIESINGER. Now, a quart basket, as I understand, contains a pound and a third of mushrooms.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it is just the reverse of that, it takes a pound and a third of mushrooms to fill a quart basket.

Mr. FIESINGER. The point is that the mushroom growers want a basket which will contain a pound of mushrooms.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman mean to infer that there have been prosecutions with regard to the sale of mushrooms in the usual containers?

Mr. FIESINGER. Absolutely; that is, they are held to be violators; but the custom in the mushroom trade is to sell by weight and not by volume.

Mr. TRUAX. In order that the gentleman from Ohio may fully understand the situation, no violations in the State of Ohio have been reported within my knowledge.

Mr. FIESINGER. There have been cases over in New York.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The only reason the gentleman from Ohio objects is because mushrooms in Ohio grow so large they cannot be put in a 1-pound basket. Is not that right?

Mr. TRUAX. No.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The situation as I understand it at the present time is that mushrooms can be sold by the pound in solid cardboard containers, but mushrooms keep better in baskets where the air can get at them more or less, and they can be packed better in baskets. Therefore the mushroom producers prefer to pack their mushrooms in baskets. It is their desire to have a basket that will hold a pound of mushrooms so they can use baskets instead of solid containers.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. TABER. Certainly.

Mr. TRUAX. The report says that this act provides for 1 pound Climax basket for mushrooms. Is that a special basket made by some particular manufacturer?

Mr. FIESINGER. I understand not.

Mr. TABER. That is a standard basket made by all basket manufacturers.

Mr. TRUAX. Correct.

Mr. FIESINGER. They can make them out of paper or out of wood.

Mr. TRUAX. Why should they have a name on them?

Mr. BLANTON. That means that we have reached the climax of this argument.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object—and I do not want to object to the bill—I desire to bring out one more point and then I shall withdraw my reservation of objection. Here is a letter from the Federal Land Bank of Louisville, Ky., dated March 20, 1934, in which they rejected a loan in Loveland, Ohio, on the following grounds, and I ask permission to read a portion of this letter.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may be allowed to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TRUAX. No. I want to read this one letter.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it deal with mushrooms?

Mr. TRUAX. It does.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. TRUAX. This deals with the subject under discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. TRUAX. This letter, as I stated, is from the Federal Land Bank of Louisville, dated March 20, 1934, and is as follows:

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF LOUISVILLE,
Louisville, Ky., March 20, 1934.

Re application No. 145737, Madaline Tarkington.

Hon. CHARLES V. TRUAX,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. TRUAX: This is to acknowledge your letter of March 7, addressed to Mr. Ernest Rice, General Agent of the Farm Credit Administration of Louisville, relative to the above-captioned application.

An investigation of our files reveals that this application was for the purpose of paying the existing indebtedness of the applicant, and also for the purpose of installing a heating plant in her dairy barn in order to produce mushrooms on a commercial basis.

The production of mushrooms seems to be a very highly specialized type of agriculture, and we are inclined to doubt the ability of the applicant to successfully manage such an enterprise. Furthermore, it seems that the average farmer in her community would know nothing of such an enterprise, and if the farm had to be sold at any time, there would probably be no one in the community who would be in a position to buy the farm and continue the production of that agricultural commodity. For this reason we are inclined to doubt the advisability of making the loan to the applicant on a specialized basis.

On any other basis the income which she would derive from the farm would not be sufficient to maintain the rather valuable improvements which seem to be on the farm. Only a relatively small portion of the land is available for cultivation, and the management, on a general agricultural basis, seems to be unsatisfactory.

We have endeavored to explain our position in regard to this matter, and we wish to assure you that this application has received our considerate attention at all times. On the basis of information at our disposal, however, it seems inadvisable to grant financial assistance to this applicant at the present time.

Very truly yours,

(C. L. Graybill, by S. Beverly Davis),
THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF LOUISVILLE.

That is one of the many, many asinine reasons which have been assigned for rejecting farmers' loans in Ohio. I wanted to get that in the RECORD, and now withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to fix standards for Climax baskets for grapes and other fruits and vegetables, and to fix standards for baskets and other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables, and for other purposes", approved August 31, 1916, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The standards for Climax baskets for mushrooms shall be those set forth above, except that a 1-pound Climax basket of the following dimensions shall be standard for mushrooms when plainly stamped or marked on the side of the basket with the words 'for mushrooms only': Length of bottom piece, 7¼ inches; width of bottom piece, 3 1/16 inches; thickness of bottom piece, ⅜ inch; height of basket, 3⅝ inches; top of basket, length, 9⅜ inches; width, 4⅜ inches; all outside measurements. Basket to have a cover 4⅜ by 9⅜ inches when cover is used."

SEC. 2. Section 3 of such act of August 31, 1916, is amended by inserting immediately before the semicolon a comma and the following: "or to use in any such shipment for any commodity other than mushrooms the 1-pound Climax basket provided for in section 1 of this act."

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect — months after the date of its enactment.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "effect" insert the word "two."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2817, to amend the act relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, approved January 25, 1934.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3185, to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, with respect to farm prices.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9273, to extend the public-land laws of the United States to certain lands in the Red River in Oklahoma.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask for an explanation of this bill.

Mr. McCLINTIC. In 1923, when the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a final decision in the Red River controversy deciding that the south bank of the river was the line between the two States of Oklahoma and Texas, and that the land between the medial line and Texas belonged to the Federal Government, it left a little island down there in the Red River which I think contained some two or three hundred acres. This island was homesteaded some 10 or 12 years ago by a homesteader. Since that time he has died and he left a widow who has been holding down the land for these many years hoping that at some time the Federal Government would allow her to perfect the homestead entry.

This is the only claim that I know anything about, and I dare say there is no person who would object to the Federal Government's extending supervision over this land after the decision which the Supreme Court has rendered.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does this bill affect any land in the Red River belonging to the Government other than the tract the gentleman has just mentioned?

Mr. McCLINTIC. There may be a few parcels or fractions, but may I say I have not been contacted by any other person except the widow I referred to. At my suggestion the Interior Department drew this bill and sent it to me to be introduced. A unanimous report has been made by the Public Lands Committee, and I am sure no controversy will ever arise over the same.

Mr. McFARLANE. This does not affect the one-fourth interest in the river bed up and down the river?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No.

Mr. McFARLANE. As decided by the Supreme Court?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman what the Secretary of the Interior has to say with reference to this matter? I notice somewhere in the report it was brought out that very valuable improvements have been made on this property. Is the Government expected to pay anything to anyone?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Not a penny.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the public-land laws of the United States be, and the same are hereby, extended to the public lands in that part of the Red River between the medial line and the south bank of the river, in Oklahoma, between the ninety-eighth meridian and the east boundary of the territory established as Greer County by the act of May 4, 1896 (29 Stat. 113): Provided, That the oil and gas deposits in said lands shall be disposed of only in the manner provided for by the act of March 4, 1923 (42 Stat. 1448), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to certain persons and certain corporations permits to explore, or leases of, certain lands that lie south of the medial line of the main channel of Red River, in Oklahoma, and for other purposes": Provided further, That said lands shall be opened to settlement, entry, and other disposal on such dates as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to recognize equitable claims to said lands based on settlement made prior to January 1, 1934: Provided further, That all homestead entries of said lands, the allowance of which was erroneous because the lands were not subject to entry, are hereby validated if otherwise regular: And provided further, That patents on nonmineral entries, selections, or locations of said lands shall contain a reservation to the United States of all minerals therein, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under applicable laws relating to such minerals.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MUNICIPAL WATER SUPPLY OF SALT LAKE CITY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5531, for the protection of the municipal water supply of the city of Salt Lake, State of Utah.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the author of this bill a question. After the enactment of this measure, who has title to the land, as described in section 3 of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. The present owners have the title to the land. This does not affect title to any land whatever.

Mr. CARTER of California. It certainly does something with the title to the land.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; it simply provides that the owners of mining claims shall only have the use of those claims for the purpose of mining and cutting timber under the regulations of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CARTER of California. Section 3 refers to lands that have never been homesteaded or located by mineral claims at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. That has to do with land that would hereafter be subjected to such provisions.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of California. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. It seems to me this would only give them the right to mine on the surface.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true.

Mr. GOSS. What about the men who have prospected and filed claims and may have the rights below? Does this measure take away such rights?

Mr. ROBINSON. They still have the right to mine below.

Mr. GOSS. They would still have that right?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. This bill has been considered by the mining interests that are concerned and by the corporation of Salt Lake City and the mining interests have no objection to the bill as now written. It is a bill that has become almost necessary to take care of the water supply of Salt Lake City on account of drought conditions.

Mr. CARTER of California. I want to call the gentleman's attention to section 3. The land described in this section is reserved from all forms of locations and it is set aside as a municipal water-supply reservoir for the use and benefit of Salt Lake City, and one question I want answered is this: After the enactment of this bill, if it should become law, who owns this land?

Mr. ROBINSON. Salt Lake City.

Mr. CARTER of California. In other words, the Government is giving this land to Salt Lake City?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; Salt Lake City already owns this land.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will permit, may I call attention to page 2 of the report, which says that the title to the surface would remain in the United States, but the mineral claimant would have the right to use so much thereof as may be necessary for carrying on his mining operations.

Mr. DEROUEN. That is a provision for the protection of the miner.

Mr. GOSS. But that has a hearing on the question of the gentleman from California as to the ownership of the land. In other words, the United States Government is giving this land to the city of Salt Lake.

Mr. DEROUEN. No; Salt Lake City already owns it. It gives it only the privilege of using it for the protection of the watershed of the city.

Mr. GOSS. What about the lands they take in hereafter?

Mr. ROBINSON. They are not going to take in any lands.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of California. I yield.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. The gentleman's contention is that section 3 would prevent the lands described therein from being located for mining or other purposes.

Mr. CARTER of California. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill does not do that.

Mr. CARTER of California. The bill says in section 3 that these lands "are hereby reserved from all forms of locations", and if that does not mean what I have just stated, I do not know what it means.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not the intention of the bill to stop mining?

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice, to be returned to, perhaps, during this call of the calendar if we can straighten the matter out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER NEAR GARRISON, N.DAK.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 288, the bill (H.R. 9320) to further extend the times for commencement and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N.Dak.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

HOT SPRINGS NATIONAL PARK, ARK.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9149, to accept the cession by the State of Arkansas of exclusive jurisdiction over all lands now or hereafter included within the Hot Springs National Park, Ark., and for other purposes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice this is a transfer of park lands. Generally, when these transfers are made they are made for some pecuniary advantage and I should like to ask what is the pecuniary advantage involved in this transaction?

Mr. DEROUEN. None whatever. This is additional territory that has been added to the park.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will this involve any expense to the Government?

Mr. DEROUEN. Not at all. It only permits the Government to accept this land.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does it carry with it any potential power to raid the Treasury?

Mr. DEROUEN. Not a nickel.

Mr. CARTER of California. Reserving the right to objest, how many acres are there in this?

Mr. DEROUEN. I do not know the exact area, but this simply permits the United States to accept it.

Mr. CARTER of California. There is no expense whatever to the Government, and no opportunity for it to expend a dollar?

Mr. DEROUEN. No. This is usually done in all similar park legislation. We have had similar legislation here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, approved March 25, 1933, ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over all lands now or hereafter included within the Hot Springs National Park, are hereby accepted, and the provisions of the act approved April 20, 1904, as amended by the acts of March 2, 1907, and March 3, 1911, relating to the Hot Springs Mountain Reservation, Ark., are hereby extended to all lands now or hereafter included within said park.

SEC. 2. That all hunting, or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any wild bird or animal except dangerous animals when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting personal injury, is prohibited within the limits of the said park.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER AT GARRISON, N.DAK.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who objected to returning to H.R. 9320 is ready to withdraw his objection, so I ask unanimous consent that we return to the bill, H.R. 9320, to further extend the times for commencement and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N.Dak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER of California. I should like to ask the gentleman if this is a toll bridge?

Mr. SINCLAIR. No. It is simply an extension of time to build a Federal bridge across the Missouri River.

Mr. CARTER of California. A Federal bridge?

Mr. SINCLAIR. A Federal bridge, and also a State bridge. It is on a Federal highway project.

Mr. CARTER of California. I withdraw my objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the colony of Connecticut, or near Garrison, N.Dak., authorized to be built by the State of North Dakota, by the acts of Congress approved February 10, 1932, and February 14, 1933, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from February 14, 1934.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

TO AUTHORIZE COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF THE THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE COLONY OF CONNECTICUT

The Clerk read the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 8833, to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the colony of Connecticut.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McFARLANE. Reserving the right to object, will this cost the Government anything?

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. No; not a cent.

Mr. McFARLANE. You are bearing all the expense yourselves?

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Yes.

There being no further objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the colony of Connecticut, there shall be coined by the Director of the Mint ten thousand 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and silver fineness and of a special appropriate design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be legal tender in all payments at face value.

SEC. 2. That the coins herein authorized shall be issued at par and only upon the request of the chairman or secretary of the Connecticut Tercentenary Commission.

SEC. 3. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by said commission, and all proceeds shall be used in furtherance of the Connecticut Tercentenary Commission projects.

SEC. 4. That all laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same; regulating and guarding the process of coinage; providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of the coins; for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting; for security of the coin; or for any other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein directed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five"

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "to be legal tender in all payments at face value" and insert "but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models for master dies or other preparations for this coinage."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE ELECTRO-METALLURGICAL CO., ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9269, limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain proceedings against the Electro-Metallurgical Co., New-Kanawha Power Co., and the Carbon & Carbide Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JASON LEE CENTENNIAL

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 312.

There being no objection the Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the year 1934 marks the one hundredth anniversary of the overland journey of Jason Lee to Oregon, where he established the first permanent American settlement in the year 1834 and became the first missionary to the American Indians in the territory now comprising the Northwestern States of the United States; and

Whereas this settlement by Lee, and subsequent immigration sponsored by him, made possible the historic meeting at Champoeg 9 years later at which the inhabitants of the Oregon country established the first provincial government west of the Rocky Mountains and invited the United States to assume jurisdiction over it; and

Whereas Jason Lee played a very important part in the work of Lt. William A. Slacum, of the United States Navy, who was sent by John Forsyth, Secretary of State under Jackson's administration, as the first official commissioned by the Federal Government to visit old Oregon, entertaining Lieutenant Slacum in his log home, supplying information about conditions and prospects in Oregon, cooperating with him in bringing the first cattle from California into Oregon and breaking the cattle monopoly of the Hudson's Bay Company, and drafting by Jason Lee himself of the first petition from Oregon to the United States for the setting up of an established government, the same petition being brought back to Washington by Lieutenant Slacum; and

Whereas Lieutenant Slacum wrote in his report to the State Department as follows: "No language of mine can convey an adequate idea of the great benefit these worthy and most excellent men, the Messrs. Jason and Daniel Lee, and Messrs. Shepherd and Edwards, their assistants, have conferred upon this part of the country"; and

Whereas in the year 1838 Jason Lee returned overland to the East, visiting the great centers of population, giving addresses which were widely reported in the press of the country, and holding important meetings at which Lieutenant Slacum and Members of Congress also spoke, thus arousing much interest in the colonization of Oregon; and

Whereas Jason Lee chartered the Lausanne, which sailed from New York Harbor on October 10, 1839, en route to Oregon by way of Cape Horn and the Hawaiian Islands, and which carried to Oregon a party of 51 persons, including clergymen, skilled mechanics, farmers, blacksmiths, cabinetmakers, and school teachers, all of whom landed in Oregon June 1, 1840, after a journey of approximately 8 months; and

Whereas Jason Lee is recognized as the "Father of American Oregon", as is indicated by the legend under the imposing painting of Jason Lee which hangs in the State Capitol Building at Salem, Oreg.; and

Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon by resolution has authorized during the year 1934 the celebration at the capital of that State of the one hundredth anniversary of the Jason Lee settlement, and the several States of the Union have been invited to participate therein; and

Whereas in commemoration of this Jason Lee Centennial, a "Jason Lee Special", or covered wagon, is scheduled to leave Boston on April 16, 1934, and, following the trail of Jason Lee, to arrive in Salem, Oreg., on September 8 following: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America do hereby officially recognize the great contribution made by Jason Lee in the settling and building of American Oregon and do hereby request the President of the United States to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the year 1934 as a Jason Lee Centennial with such exercises as shall commend themselves to the approval of groups in the various communities concerned.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LLOYD: Strike out all of the preamble.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment to make an inquiry. It is the understanding, is it not, that this bill carries no obligation which will involve the Federal Government in any financial expenditure?

Mr. LLOYD. There is no such obligation.

The amendment was agreed to; and the joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DIVISIONS OF JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF NORTH DAKOTA

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3357, to amend section 99 of the Judicial Code (U.S.C., title 28, sec. 180), as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object. What does the bill do?

Mr. SINCLAIR. All this does is to change the terms of court in the divisions in the State of North Dakota. It will save $3,000 a year in expense.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 99 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, sec. 180), be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 99. The State of North Dakota shall constitute one judicial district to be known as the district of North Dakota. The territory embraced on the 1st day of January 1933 in the counties of Adams, Billings, Bowman, Burleigh, Dunn, Emmons, Golden Valley, Grant, Hettinger, Kidder, Logan, McIntosh, McLean, Mercer, Morton, Oliver, Sioux, Slope, and Stark shall constitute the southwestern division of said district; and the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Barnes, Cass, Dickey, Eddy, Foster, Griggs, La Moure, Ransom, Richland, Sargent, Sheridan, Steele, Stutsman, and Wells shall constitute the southeastern division; and the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Benson, Bottineau, Cavalier, Grand Forks, Nelson, McHenry, Pembina, Pierce, Ramsey, Rolette, Traill, Towner, and Walsh shall constitute the northeastern division; and the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Burke, Divide, McKenzie, Mountrail, Renville, Ward, and Williams shall constitute the northwestern division. The several Indian reservations and parts thereof within said State shall constitute a part of the several divisions within which they are respectively situated. Terms of the district court for the southwestern division shall be held at Bismarck on the second Tuesday in March; for the southeastern division, at Fargo on the second Tuesday in December and at Jamestown on the second Tuesday in October; for the northeastern division, at Devils Lake on the second Tuesday in May and at Grand Forks on the second Tuesday in November; and for the northwestern division, at Minot on the second Tuesday in April. The clerk of the court shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at each place at which court is held in his district."

With the following committee amendment:

Line 8, page 1, strike out "1933" and insert "1932."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

TO PROTECT DERIVATIVE CITIZENSHIP STATUS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9475, to clarify the status of certain citizens who derive naturalization from parent or husband, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this is another bill seeking to lay down the bars. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS RIO GRANDE AT LAREDO, TEX.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9185, authorizing the International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rio Grande at Laredo, Tex.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, in order to get some explanation of whether this is a toll bridge?

Mr. WEST of Texas. Yes; it is a toll bridge.

Mr. CARTER of California. Then I shall have to object.

Mr. WEST of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. CARTER of California. I reserve my objection.

Mr. WEST of Texas. There is not a free bridge on the Rio Grande anywhere between the United States and Mexico, especially along the Texas border. There is no provision for it except that the two Governments would get together and bear the expense of putting in a free bridge. All the bridges are toll bridges.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, Laredo is not in my district; it is in the district of my colleague [Mr. WEST], but I happen to know all about the situation there, and I believe this bridge is absolutely necessary. When they have high water in the river it sometimes gets up over the present bridge, stopping travel. Except by our Government officials at these international bridges, we have no other way of checking up on the aliens that come from Mexico.

Mr. CARTER of California. Have we any way?

Mr. BLANTON. We have a pretty good one, because every time you have an international bridge, you have somebody there representing the United States Government. That is the only way that they can lawfully come into the country.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of California. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. The committee gave this matter very serious consideration. At the present time the bridge facilities are adequate to take care of any traffic for many years to come. There is a concrete bridge there 40 feet wide. All of our Federal departments—the Department of Customs, the Department of Internal Revenue, the Customs Department, and the Public Health Department—at the present time have their buildings near to take care of the situation the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] just raised. As far as we can find out, there is an average of travel across that bridge, which is 40 feet wide, of anywhere from 1,200 to 1,800 vehicles a day. The roadway is 32 feet wide. This bridge it is proposed to build a little farther up, probably within a half mile or a mile of the location of the present bridge. The committee in the first instance unanimously decided to take no action whatsoever, but in fairness to the gentleman from Texas, who introduced the bill, I must say a lot of statements were made that the gentleman himself has been forced to lay down on account of certain financial interests.

In all fairness to the gentleman from Texas, the subcommittee reported the bill, as well as the full committee.

Mr. BLANTON. The present bridge is not adequate, because high water covers it and stops travel.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements of the two gentlemen from Texas, and further in view of the fact that this is an international bridge, I desire to withdraw my objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I am not withdrawing my reservation of objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. In just a moment. I want to call the attention of the House to this statement:

> All existing highway bridges across the Rio Grande are toll structures, and it is the view of this Department, as has likewise been expressed to be the view of highway officials of the Republic of Mexico, that plans should be undertaken to make the bridges across this boundary stream free so as to encourage travel between the two countries. While there is no definite plan in operation for accomplishing that at this time, the question of its ultimate accomplishment is made more difficult each time a new toll bridge is authorized to be constructed between the two countries. The Department, therefore, recommends against favorable action on the bill.
> Sincerely yours,
> R. G. TUGWELL, Acting Secretary.

Mr. BLANTON. Then Dr. Tugwell is, after all, very influential. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will go down there across that bridge at Laredo this year. This is on the main highway from the United States to Monterey, thence on to Mexico City. Sometimes cars are on that bridge for a very long time before they can clear.

It would well repay the gentleman from Ohio to go down to Monterey. It is one of the most beautiful trips in the world, to Monterey, and thence on to Mexico City. There is a wonderful highway between Laredo and Monterey. It embraces one of the longest stretches of straight boulevard in the country. The mountains around Monterey are simply wonderful. You will find growing profusely oranges, lemons, grapefruit, limes, avocados, and a lot of other good things to eat. There are plenty of deer, wild turkeys, and bear.

On the main plaza two nights each week all the boys and girls congregate, marching around the square, the girls facing one way, the boys the other, until each boy and girl finds the one they are looking for, and then they all march around the same direction together. You will find many tourists from the Eastern States in Monterey and Mexico City during the summer months, and they need bridges to cross the Rio Grande when they want to go to Monterey on business or otherwise.

Mr. TRUAX. What does the gentleman mean by "otherwise"?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, pleasure and business; business and pleasure; that is what takes Americans to Mexico. There are thousands of tourists every summer go to Monterey and Mexico City from the United States. It is one of the most beautiful trips in the world.

Mr. TRUAX. Who and what is the International Bridge Co.?

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague can tell you. I should be glad to see a dozen new bridges built across the Rio Grande between El Paso and Brownsville.

Mr. TRUAX. Not toll bridges. There should be some free bridges.

Mr. BLANTON. It will be many years before there will be a free bridge.

Mr. TRUAX. The Government should go to building some free bridges.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman have this Government build a free bridge across into a foreign country, and not have the foreign country pay anything toward it?

Mr. TRUAX. No; I would have them pay their part of it.

Mr. BLANTON. But they are not yet ready to do it.

Mr. TRUAX. But the Department says that every time you authorize another toll bridge it makes it that much more difficult to get a free bridge between the two countries.

Mr. BLANTON. All of us hope to see free bridges, and they will come in time, but until we do have free bridges, the toll bridges come in awfully handy.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] has previously on many occasions indicated that he has no great confidence in Dr. Tugwell's capacity as an agriculturalist, with which I agree, and the gentleman has further indicated that he does have some regard for his capacity as a bridge builder. I have no regard for his capacity as a bridge builder. Will not the gentleman go along with me and make it unanimous? He and I agree that this man Tugwell knows nothing about agriculture or bridge building either. Let us build this bridge.

Mr TRUAX. Who and what is the International Bridge Corporation?

Mr. WEST of Texas. It is a private enterprise.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it affiliated with the United States Steel Trust—and I spell that "s-t-e-a-l."

Mr. WEST of Texas. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it a subsidiary of Wall Street or is it composed of local capital?

Mr. WEST of Texas. It is largely local capital.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The Government is going into all kinds of business. Why not let private capital build a few of these bridges?

Mr. TRUAX. That is what private capital has been doing all the time.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Has the gentleman from Texas obtained the consent of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], who always objects to these bridges?

Mr. WEST of Texas. No; I did not get the consent of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Missouri does not object to international bridges.

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I am opposed to all private toll bridges. I think the Government ought to build these bridges.

Mr. BLANTON. For 900 miles from El Paso down to Brownsville, where my friend [Mr. WEST] lives on the Rio Grande, there is not a single free bridge. All of them are toll bridges. The people are awfully glad to have the toll bridges.

Mr. TRUAX. We cannot make right situations by continually adding wrong ones. In view of the position I have taken on other bridge bills, and in view of the position I am going to take on one or two others on this calendar, I must object to this bill, or at least I will ask unanimous consent that it be passed over until the gentleman can show me what kind of a corporation is building this structure.

Mr. WEST of Texas. I object to passing it over without prejudice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TRUAX. Then I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I am just as much in favor of free bridges as the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. I want to know whether it is being built by international bankers.

Mr. WEST of Texas. Oh, no.

Mr. TRUAX. Then just who is the International Bridge Co.?

Mr. WEST of Texas. That is a private corporation, the stock of which is owned locally by residents of that section.

Mr. TRUAX. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that in my judgment the Mexicans will not be coming across this bridge to spend their money in the United States, but our citizens will be going across it to spend their money in Mexico.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. The Mexicans come across the border every day to spend their money in this country.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, again I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, to that I object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. MARYS RIVER AT SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9585, authorizing the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Marys River at or near Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TRUAX. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his objection? I think possibly the gentleman has the wrong bill in mind. In the case of the present bill, Calendar No. 311, the State Department, War Department, and Department of Agriculture are in favor of the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. This bridge is to be built by the city of Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the time in which to study this bill, but the gentleman from Michigan informs me that the bridge is a public undertaking by the municipality.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And the State Department, the War Department, and the Agricultural Department are satisfied with the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The city of Sault Ste. Marie will build the bridge.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate international commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Marys River, so far as the United States has jurisdiction over the waters of such river, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Canada, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act, and subject to the approval of the proper authorities in the Dominion of Canada.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property in the State of Michigan needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of Michigan, upon making just compensation therefor to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge in accordance with any laws of the State of Michigan applicable thereto, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., its successors and assigns; and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VETERAN LEGISLATION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio speech made by my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, although I have the privilege of being a member of Post No. 240 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States in my home city of Lynn, Mass., I speak tonight on the subject of veteran legislation as a Member of the House of Representatives who believes there is a definite distinction between the men who were able to serve their country in time of war and those who, for some reason or other, found it convenient to evade this responsibility of citizenship.

Unfortunately, the public has been greatly misled on the subject of veteran legislation. This situation became worse when antiveteran forces deliberately misconstrued the effects of the independent offices appropriation bill which was passed by Congress on March 28 over a Presidential veto.

I am not here to defend Congress on this issue, because it needs no defense. I am greatly amused, however, by the frequent charge that Members of Congress only vote for veteran benefits because they want to be reelected at the polls. You have been told that Congress refused to accept a White House veto on veteran legislation simply because we were afraid of the veteran vote. The absurdity of this insult is exceeded only by the ignorance of those who voice such opinions. In the face of existing public sentiment, and with respect to my party now in control, any man of ordinary intelligence should know that it is much more popular for a Member of Congress to support the administration at every opportunity. I hardly need tell you that the popular vote is much stronger in any community than the veteran vote. Any observer of public opinion will admit that the masses are following the leadership of the President, and that any Member of Congress who wants to court the favor of the great majority of voters only needs to be a rubber stamp for those in control.

I cite these truths in reply to those who question the sincerity of Congress when we tried to rectify the mistakes that were made with the passage of the National Economy Act on March 20, 1933. I was opposed to the Economy Act from the very beginning. I still believe that it should have been repealed in its entirety. I am sorry that this was not accomplished when we passed the independent offices appropriation bill on March 28. We who opposed the Economy Act did so at a deliberate risk of losing our popularity. If we were merely looking for votes, all we had to do was to stick with the majority and we would still be able to save our faces with the veteran votes by "passing the buck" to the White House.

I want to say at this time to my comrades of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States that you have every reason to be proud of our clean, fearless commander in chief, James Van Zandt, for his vigorous and determined leadership in the campaign that the V.F.W. sponsored during the past year for complete repeal of this legislation and the human misery for which it was responsible. It was this organization that carried the truth to the people and exposed the injustices of the Economy Act in a way that forced the administration to see the light.

When the Economy Act was passed in March 1933, Government expenditures for veterans were reduced by approximately $440,000,000. During the months that followed, the President himself admitted that some serious mistakes had been made. He ordered changes and regulations which restored a portion of these reductions. On March 27, when the President signed his veto message, he himself had modified the original $440,000,000 reduction to the extent of $117,000,000.

Despite the general opinion that the Economy Act has been completely wrecked, the Government is still saving more than $250,000,000 under the veterans' provisions of the Economy Act. I ask you to remember that there are still 500,000 disabled veterans who are receiving no assistance whatsoever from the Federal Government. There is nothing sensational or nothing to become alarmed about in the benefits that were restored to our disabled veterans when Congress voted to override a Presidential veto. We have restored approximately 175,000 Spanish-American War veterans to the pension rolls. These men will again receive compensation for disabilities the Government itself never questioned until the Economy Act was passed. All these men have reached the average age of 60. Handicapped by age and physical disabilities—in the face of wide-spread unemployment—these veterans of the War with Spain were either forced into the streets, to live as they could, or into institutions of public charity. Moreover, we have given to the disabled veteran who is in need the right to free hospitalization, even though his disability may not be service-connected. But this service can be obtained by such veterans only when beds are available. This means we will only make full use of the facilities that are already available.

Although the bill passed by Congress over White House objections involved an appropriation of approximately $228,000,000, please understand that more than one half of this sum did not go to veterans. About $125,000,000 is to be used to restore pay cuts for Federal employees and for the maintenance of 18 different independent bureaus and commissions. Much less than one half the total sum of $228,000,000 is to be used for all veterans of all wars, their dependents and widows and orphans. Some have the false impression that the bulk of this money is going to World War veterans. You will probably be amazed to learn that less than $45,000,000 of this money will be spent for the care of World War veterans. Of this amount, we are going to spend approximately $10,000,000 during the coming fiscal year for the care of 29,000 World War veterans who are suffering from tuberculosis, those who are blind as a result of injuries or disease, and those who are mentally unfit and are today confined in hospitals or sanitariums with their minds completely blank. This is something I sincerely believe the American people would want to do for any group of unfortunate citizens so afflicted. This particular group of unfortunate men happens to be composed of veterans classified as presumptive cases. There is every reason to presume that their condition today is due to the experiences they underwent while in the service. But even if they were ordinary citizens, with no extraordinary patriotic service to their credit, their care and welfare is an obligation that human sympathy can hardly ignore.

When the Economy Act was passed we were told that no veteran suffering from a disability actually incurred in the service would suffer any curtailment in benefits. Despite these pledges, the regulations provided for a straight 10-percent cut in war-service-connected cases. In addition, a change in the method of rating cases was made, and our war-disabled veterans were cut from 25 to 30 percent on an average, and in some cases as high as 60 percent. Congress has restored these benefits, with the sincere belief that we—as a nation—can find our way out of our economic troubles without taking a few paltry dollars from the men who were crippled and maimed in defense of their country.

Today there are only approximately 32,000 veterans receiving any compensation whatsoever for disabilities they are unable to prove were incurred in actual war service. But these men are totally and permanently disabled. By order of the President himself these men have been allowed to remain on the roll to draw the munificent sum of $30 per month. We paid these men on an average of $1 a day when they were strong and healthy and able to kill and be killed. Today we are only asked to pay them $1 a day for lying flat on their backs in bed wondering how soon the end will come. This $30, I can assure you, is not being used to buy automobiles or luxuries. It is buying medicines to relieve pain and suffering; it is paying the rent for humble rooms and buying food and clothes—not only for the disabled veteran himself but in most cases for his wife and children. Anyone who would term this a wasteful expenditure on the part of the Federal Government must have a heart as hard as the gold he would like to save.

Carefully analyzed, the facts are very simple. Contrary to the propaganda that has been issued by antiveteran forces, Congress only voted to spend approximately $16,000,000 more than President Roosevelt thought should be spent in correcting the evils of the Economy Act. Obviously, the charge that Congress—in voting favorably for this $16,000,000 difference, voted to wreck our economic program—is palpably ridiculous.

The manner in which this action on the part of Congress has been exaggerated has even led many people to believe that Congress has voted to pay the so-called "bonus." Please understand that the bonus was not included in this bill and had nothing to do with its consideration. These are two different and distinct issues. The House voted on March 12 in favor of immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates. This bill is still pending in the Senate. I sincerely hope that the Senate will act in support of the House on this issue because I am convinced that payment of this confessed obligation to the veteran will be a distinct aid to the country as a whole. We who believe that the bonus should be paid without further delay are convinced that this is the only method by which we can increase the purchasing power of the masses in a way that will help every individual citizen.

The benefits of this bill are no longer confined to veterans alone. Payment of the so-called "bonus" will help every class or group of our citizens except one, and this group is composed of those who have amassed great wealth in the past through the buying and selling of Government bonds and the collection of interest from Uncle Sam. These are the people who object to the payment of the bonus through the issuance of currency notes, because they are afraid that it will be the beginning of the end for tax-exempt securities in the future. They are afraid that the issuance of Treasury notes for this purpose will show Uncle Sam how to raise the necessary funds in the future without paying exorbitant interest rates to bondholders. This is a far-fetched conclusion, because we know that when Uncle Sam has to raise money through the sale of bonds, there must be some inducement in the form of security and interest before the people will buy these bonds. We claim that currency notes can be issued for this particular purpose without adopting this method as a permanent economic policy.

If the National Economy League is afraid that Congress will continue to swap veteran benefits for votes, it can avoid this alleged danger by merely following the proposals of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Immediate cash payment of the so-called "bonus" will settle this particular question once and for all and take it out of the hands of Congress. Adoption of a uniform pension system, as advocated by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, will permanently eliminate future bickerings and arguments over veteran benefits.

Let us decide now on equal veteran benefits for all veterans of all wars suffering from similar disabilities. The V.F.W. proposes the appointment of a nonpartisan commission that will formulate these principles. With the adoption of these principles, there will no longer be any need for discussions of veteran matters on the floor of Congress and Members of the House and Senate will be freed of the accusation that they are voting for veteran benefits in order to keep their jobs.

In conclusion may I say that I have great faith in the common sense and love of fair play of the American people.

I believe that when the people pierce the black smoke screen of antiveteran propaganda of the Economy League and the other dollar patriots that they will rise up and demand that full justice be done to disabled veterans whose only crime is that they gave part and if necessary would have given all their blood for the United States of America.

BRIDGE ACROSS CHESAPEAKE BAY

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3211, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Chesapeake Bay between Baltimore and Kent Counties, Md.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this a toll bridge?

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection? I do not believe this is a toll-bridge bill, but I cannot state positively.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman can assure me that this is not a toll bridge, I object.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGES IN THE STATE OF OREGON

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 3114, to extend the times for commencing the construction of certain bridges in the State of Oregon.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are these toll bridges?

Mr. HOLMES. This is a bill providing for the construction of bridges by municipalities. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT], will explain it, I am sure.

Mr. MOTT. These bridges are already under construction in the State of Oregon.

Mr. CARTER of California. Are they toll bridges?

Mr. MOTT. At least one of them is a toll bridge, but it is a State-owned bridge.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing the construction of the following bridges, authorized to be built by the State of Oregon, are hereby extended to October 1, 1934: (1) Across the Umpqua River, at or near Reedsport, Oreg., authorized by act of Congress approved June 13, 1933; (2) across Yaquina Bay, at or near Newport, Oreg., authorized by act of Congress approved June 13, 1933; (3) across Coos Bay, at or near North Bend, Oreg., authorized by act of Congress approved June 13, 1933; (4) across the Siuslaw River, at or near Florence, Oreg., authorized by act of Congress approved June 13, 1933; and (5) across Alsea Bay, at or near Waldport, Oreg., authorized by act of Congress approved June 15, 1933.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "commencing", insert the words "and completing."

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "to October 1, 1934."

Page 1, line 6, insert "1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title of the bill was amended.

QUINAIELT INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1882, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for lots to Indians within the Indian village of Taholah, on the Quinaielt Indian Reservation, Wash.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, upon application by any qualified Indian living within the Indian village of Taholah, on the Quinaielt Indian Reservation in the State of Washington, to issue to such Indian a patent for not to exceed two contiguous lots within said village, one of which lots must be occupied by said applicant: Provided, That where pursuant to section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat.L. 858), one lot within said Indian village has heretofore been patented to any Indian living thereon said Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to patent to such Indian, or to his or her heirs in case of death, one additional contiguous lot wherever available. All patents issued hereunder shall be of the legal effect prescribed by said section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910, and all lots so patented to said Indians shall be disposed of as provided for in section 1 of that act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

YAKIMA CONFEDERATED TRIBES OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5864, to authorize the payment of expenses of delegates of the Yakima Confederated Tribes of Indians while on a mission to represent such tribes before Congress and the executive departments at the seat of government, and for other purposes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice this bill carries with it an adverse report from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. That was on April 2. Since that time the bill has been revised and has been rewritten by a member of the Indian Service. It was passed by the committee while he was there.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I notice that the amendment which the gentleman refers to provides for an expenditure of money. Is that the Indians' money or the Government's money?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. That is their own money.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have no objection to the Indians spending their own money. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $2,500 to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in paying expenses of delegates of the tribal council of the Yakima Confederated Tribes of Indians while on a mission to the seat of government in the District of Columbia, to present the petitions and claims of such tribes to the Congress and its committees and to the executive departments of the Government with respect to encroachments on the reservation of such tribes, permanent allotments for members of such tribes, sale of timber on tribal lands, reservation schools, grazing returns, consultation with the leaders in affairs involving treaty rights, and such other matters as the tribal council may authorize the delegates to present. Such expenses shall include the cost of preparing and presenting such petitions and claims, travel and subsistence expenses for authorized delegates of such tribal council while in and en route to and from the District of Columbia on such mission, the cost of procuring the attendance of necessary witnesses, and the fees and expenses of necessary legal counsel, and any other expenses necessary in carrying out such mission. Such expenses shall be paid under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe pursuant to the provisions of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $2,500 to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in" and insert "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not to exceed $2,500."

Page 2, line 14, strike out "fees and."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE NORSEMEN

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein an address delivered by my colleague [Mr. KNUTSON] on May 17.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON at Brooklyn, N.Y., Thursday, May 17, 1934, before the United Norwegian Societies of New York:

Mr. Chairman and friends, this day has a deep significance for those of us who can boast of Norse blood. It is our natal day and marks the anniversary of the adoption of the organic law of old Norway. This evening we have gathered, as have tens of thousands of Americans of Norse ancestry in other places in this country, to commemorate that great occasion. To me this event has especial significance because I received my first impressions of this wonderful land of freedom and opportunity in New York, the gateway to the promised land, nearly a half century ago, amidst the hustle and bustle of old Castle Garden. It may not be amiss to pause for a moment and contemplate what has befallen those of us who left "gamle Norge" to seek their fortunes in the new land of promise, whose radiant light has drawn to its shores millions and millions from other and less-favored lands.

The Norseman did not come here that he might have freedom, because he has never been slave or serf. He was drawn here because of the superior advantages to be found—land, homes, opportunity, equality—these were some of the magnets that drew our fathers to these far-away shores, whose banner of bright stars and stripes has been baptized in the best blood of American patriotism on many a bloody battlefield and which proudly floats over 125,000,000 free Americans of every race, creed, and color.

Some of those who came tarried at the port of entry, and I trust that those who remained here have enjoyed happiness and that measure of success that is the reward of right living, industry, and honesty. However, the vast majority of the newcomers resolutely set their faces toward the land of the wide and open spaces in the Middle West, where they quickly became a part and parcel of their adopted land. Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, the Dakotas, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, and Utah. These are the States that became the cradle of Norwegian culture in America, and may I say with pardonable pride that none of the newer States have contributed more generously and effectively to the upbuilding of our great and common country. In every forward move Americans of Norwegian blood and ancestry have played a prominent and decisive part.

The early Norwegians were a sturdy and dependable race. Sprung from the groin of a race that has for thousands of years braved the hidden dangers of the deep, who, though numerically weak, conquered the greater part of the then known world by reason of their superior bravery and dauntless courage, it was to be expected that the majority of them would take the pathway that offered the greater hardships and adventures. By oxen and covered wagon they followed the star of destiny westward, ever westward from one State to another State, until many of them had traversed the continent of North America and spread into bordering countries. With many it was the restless urge that had been bred into them by countless generations who had gained their livelihood upon the bosom of the restless deep. They had never been serfs or slaves, and the great spaces of the West appealed to them as the limitless heights appeal to the eagle.

They faced the hardships and dangers of frontier life with all the courage for which their great race has been famed for thousands of years. For them it was much work and little play. There were homes to build, often of sod or logs; there were schools and churches to establish, for they were an enlightened race that believed in education as well as in the tenets that were laid down by the lowly Nazarene nearly 2,000 years before. Wherever they went they established law and order, for lawlessness and disorder are as foreign to the nature of the Norseman as they are repugnant. He soon became the pillar of his community and in time a great leader. The history of the West would be incomplete were honorable mention of his great contribution to its development omitted.

When the great Civil War broke out, back in the dark days of '61, the sons of Norway and their offspring flocked to the colors of their adopted land by the tens of thousands, and Father Abraham had no more loyal or stalwart support than that given by the hardy race to whom battle in the cause of freedom and righteousness is as the fire gong to the old fire horse.

They acquitted themselves with great credit and the Norwegian regiment commanded by Col. Hans Hegg won for itself a place in the American Hall of Fame; and when the great fratricidal struggle was over, they quietly returned to their homes and resumed their usual vocations.

May I say at this point that the American soldiers and sailors of Norse blood played an equally gallant part in the great World War where they served by the hundreds of thousands.

When I was a boy, the great Northwest was yet open to homestead entry, and I can well recall the thousands of covered wagons that trekked their weary course westward, where were to be found homes and opportunities. Hardship, yes; but to them it was home, as a poet of our own blood, then living in Wisconsin, has so aptly described:

"Aa so grov me et hol bort i bakka
Det var hus, det var heim, det var bu,
Men aat kvelden naar heimat det lakka
Var det heimet dog kjert, kan du tro."

The Lord has been good to us. Today the West is the bread-and-butter basket of the world. It is dotted with cities that are seats of learning, culture, and art and industry; farms with big red barns and comfortable homes. We can show our appreciation for these blessings by being good and loyal Americans.

Your true Norseman is adaptable and he easily and quickly adjusts himself to new environments, hence he readily became imbued with the principles upon which this Government was founded. Norsemen have occupied with credit many positions of public trust. First and foremost Knute Nelson, the first Norwegian born to become Governor of a sovereign American State and a member of the Senate of the United States. Then we have such outstanding characters as Haugen of Iowa, Helgesen of North Dakota, Steenerson, O. J. Kvale, all now deceased; Volstead, Sidney Anderson, Selvig, Andresen of Minnesota, Williamson of South Dakota, Burtness of North Dakota, and Nelson of Wisconsin. Former Senators Reed Smoot of Utah, Asle J. Gronna of North Dakota, and James J. Blaine of Wisconsin.

These are but a few of the illustrious Norsemen of a bygone day. Today HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota, and PETER NORBECK, of South Dakota, are in the Senate, and in the House are EINAR HOIDALE and myself, both born across the sea, and former Governor THEODORE CHRISTIANSON, also PAUL KVALE, of Minnesota, who is here this evening, and KNUTE HILL, of Washington State. Americans of Norwegian extraction have occupied and are occupying high judicial and professional positions, and they have attained conspicuous successes in the arts, the professions, in business, and in agriculture. In fact in all activities that require integrity, industry, intelligence, ability, and steadfastness have they acquitted themselves with credit to the land of their origin as well as to that of their adoption.

My countrymen, the past is a luminous figure on the eastern horizon that we love and revere, but it is to the present and future that I would address myself for a few brief moments, if you will kindly indulge me.

We are now passing through one of the most painful periods of readjustment of which we have record. Fortunes and savings have been wiped out, values have depreciated to a fraction of their former worth, and homes have been lost. But it is not my purpose to analyze here the cause but rather to make an appraisal of the future.

The old order has passed. It was ruthless and cruel. Under its regime property rights were held equal, if not superior, to human rights.

A new order has been inaugurated which marks another milestone in the progress of the American people. Naturally, the program being largely experimental, mistakes will be made, for we have embarked upon uncharted and strange waters. From time to time hidden and treacherous shoals will reveal themselves.

Under such circumstances, it is necessary that the navigation of the Ship of State shall be in the hands of experienced navigators upon whose knowledge and wisdom rests the very future of the Republic.

Great changes lie before us. Heretofore the distribution of wealth has been centered too much, there has been too much want and suffering in the midst of plenty; we have seen great fortunes grow ever larger, whilst the condition of the producer and toiler has not kept pace. For this unhappy and intolerable situation I blame no one in particular. Rather, it is the fruit of a system that we have happily outgrown. After all, life is an evolution, and we must go forward or be pressed backward. We cannot stand still. With our acknowledged capacity we must go forward.

A new day lies before us, and, with its added responsibilities, we are facing a battle between the new and the old that is as inexorable as the laws of the Persians and the Medes. In this struggle will be found in opposition those who would scuttle the ship rather than acknowledge defeat.

It is related that when the great Robert Bruce lay dying he called to his bedside his trusted friend and lieutenant, the Earl of Douglas, and charged him that at his death his heart should be removed from his breast, encased in a golden urn, and conveyed to the Holy Sepulcher for interment. When the great Bruce had breathed his last, the faithful Douglas followed his dead master's instructions, and surrounding himself with a small escort of Scottish chiefs, set out on his holy mission. One day, when the little band had nearly reached their destination, they were set upon by a body of Saracens who threatened to overcome them by reason of superior numbers. When all seemed lost Douglas stood up in his stirrups and taking the golden urn in his hand hurled it into the midst of the enemy, shouting, "Lead on, heart of Bruce, we follow thee, we follow thee." The Scots, never having known defeat when following that great chieftain, took new heart, turned upon the enemy with the fury of the wind and overcame them. So, my friends, when the enemies of the new order would retard or prevent, we will take the great heart of Lief Ericson, encase it in our love and affection and hurl it into the midst of the enemy and shout, "Lead on, great heart of Lief, we follow thee, we follow thee", and we shall take new courage and devotion and overcome those who would subvert and thwart our progress toward a new day and better things.

KING HILL IRRIGATION DISTRICT

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9583, to convey to the King Hill irrigation district, State of Idaho, all the interest of the United States in the King Hill Federal reclamation project, and for other purposes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I reserve my objection.

Mr. COFFIN. In view of the fact that that would practically defeat the bill at this session and that this bill merely grants authority to the Interior Department to do what they have wanted to do for years, may I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection?

This is a project that has been completed for years. There is no possibility of the liens ever being paid by the settlers. This bill needs the action of the Senate, and is of extreme importance to the people of this district.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. As the report embodies certain language to the effect the district has paid no part of the construction costs, I am constrained to object. The Government has spent something over a million dollars upon this particular project.

Mr. COFFIN. That is a fact, but the Government in spending the money acted on a misconception of their engineers, and the ultimate effect of the spending of the money under the circumstances was to mislead the settlers and get them into an utterly impossible position.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I do not want to be construed as objecting to any bill by asking that it go over without prejudice. May I ask why the bill was not brought up before if it is so important?

Mr. COFFIN. The Interior Department brought the matter to my attention so late in the session that this is the first opportunity I have had to get it on the Consent Calendar. It will be noted that the Interior Department recommends that the bill be passed, and the bill in its present form is as drawn by the Interior Department.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is very hard for me to reconcile the Government building a project which cost millions of dollars and then immediately donating it to a private water-and-power company.

Mr. COFFIN. They took over this project some years ago after private parties and the State had endeavored to put it over.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And they want to turn it over to the power-and-water company now?

Mr. COFFIN. This bill authorizes turning the district over to the settlers. The King Hill irrigation district is composed of the settlers out there. There is no power company involved in the matter.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I would like to have more opportunity to look into the question.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8460, to amend section 392 of title 5 of the United States Code.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I reserve my objection.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I wish the genttleman from Ohio would not object to this bill, which permits the Postmaster General to adjust and settle claims caused by the negligence of officers and employees of the Post Office Department; that is, where the claims do not exceed $500.

A bill was passed, as the report shows, some years ago, giving the Postmaster General this authority; but through a construction by the Comptroller General the Postmaster General is not able to settle claims where private parties are involved. Consequently we have to clarify the law and implement the law in order that the Comptroller General's present ruling and precedent will be overcome.

What happens now? At every session of Congress the Postmaster General has to send down to our committee anywhere from 100 to 500 small claims, from a few dollars to $500, in connection with cases where agents of the Post Office Department have through negligence caused injury to private property, such as is occasioned by automobile accidents, and so forth. We have to submit a private bill in every instance and in every case in order to get relief for the private party.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. I may say that this Congress has paid dozens of such bills. Whenever anyone is hurt or killed by an employee of the Postal Department, it is assumed that the employee is responsible for the accident. I may say to the gentleman that the law in its present form is exactly the way it ought to be, in my judgment. These claims should be brought down here, and there is no one official that should be delegated authority by this Congress to settle any of the claims that may come under $500.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. This is under $500. The gentleman from Ohio has read the letter addressed by Mr. Douglas to the Postmaster General?

Mr. TRUAX. No; I did not read it.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. This is approved by Mr. Douglas and by the Postmaster General or Mr. Crowley.

Mr. TRUAX. If the gentleman will amend the bill and make it $50 instead of $500, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman agree to making it $250?

Mr. TRUAX. No.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I am speaking for the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], the chairman of the committee, and I do not want to consent to a limit of $50 as against $500.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my opposition is not to the amount but to the principle. My notion is that if the Postmaster General should have the right to adjust up to $500, he ought to have the same right up to $1,000 or perhaps $5,000. The gentleman has stated that at the present time there is a law on the statute books which was intended to give the Postmaster General this power, but the Comptroller General has decided that it did not come within some other law.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If that is the case and if the Comptroller has already ruled against it, how will this language correct the situation?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. If the gentleman will turn to page 2 of the report, he will find set out there the original statute of June 16, 1921, which gives the Postmaster General this authority, not to exceed $500, and then there appears in italic, which is the amendment we are considering today—

> And this authority shall hereafter be construed as extending to cases caused by the negligence of any officer or employee of the Post Office Department or Postal Service acting within the scope of his employment.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, it is perfectly apparent to everyone here that if this bill were passed the Postmaster General himself would not have the time to sit in these hearings. The authority would have to be delegated to some underling, and it is always easier to obtain money or secure the payment of claims in that way. When they come down here and the claims have to be passed upon by a committee and then brought on the floor of the House and passed by unanimous consent, we are following a much safer plan than the one proposed by this bill, and therefore I object to the bill.

THE COWLITZ RIVER, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9430, to provide a preliminary examination of the Cowlitz River and its tributaries, in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call attention to the language of the bill—

> That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made—

And so forth. Might not this be construed as an appropriation?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. GOSS. How could the Secretary carry out the purpose of the bill without an appropriation?

Mr. WILSON. The law authorizes an appropriation for War Department surveys of rivers and harbors.

Mr. CARTER of California. If the gentleman will permit, the bill provides that the cost shall be paid from the appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

Mr. GOSS. I have read that language, and I want to call attention to a point which I think the Comptroller General should watch out for in this connection. In 1902, in one of the appropriation bills, chapter 1351 of the Fifty-seventh Congress, there was this language:

> Hereafter no act of Congress shall be construed to make an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States unless such act shall, in specific terms, declare an appropriation to be made for the purpose or purposes specified in the act.

Under this permanent law, which was a rider on this old appropriation bill back in 1902, I am wondering whether this could be construed to allow an appropriation or not.

Mr. BLANTON. That provision became permanent law because the word "hereafter" made it permanent.

Mr. GOSS. Of course, and that is what I am pointing out now.

Mr. BLANTON. And it certainly affects this bill.

Mr. GOSS. Yes; and if the Comptroller General will refer to this particular language, I do not see how he can let an appropriation go by in a matter of this kind and in this case you would not get any survey made.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. In addition to the explanation which has been made by the Chairman of the Committee on Flood Control [Mr. WILSON], I wish to say I am the author of this bill and the three which follow it on the calendar, and the language in each one is identical with the language in all similar flood-survey bills that have been passed.

Mr. GOSS. I realize that.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. It seems to me that the final phrase of the bill covers the point which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. An amendment striking out the words "and directed" would meet the gentleman's point.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. The language to which I refer is "the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors."

In other words, I construe this language to mean that the surveys could not be made or the cost defrayed except out of appropriations that have heretofore, or may hereafter, be made, and this is not a bill which appropriates any sum whatever; the War Department appropriation bill provides funds for the United States Army engineers to make such examinations and surveys as are contemplated by this legislation.

Mr. GOSS. I may say to the gentleman that it has been often construed in such a way that appropriations have been made when the words "and directed" were put in after the word "authorized."

As the gentleman from Washington has just said, if you did strike out "direct" and even dispense with the permanent law, it would not help it.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I do not think that is necessary; if you strike out that language you take out the language that provides for the survey to be made. That is the only language whereby the Secretary of War and the United States Corps of Engineers would be empowered to make a survey, which are necessary on all these rivers and their tributaries, as shown by the disastrous floods which occurred in December 1933, causing millions of dollars' worth of damage to property and some loss of life. I trust that no objection will be made to their passage.

Mr. BLANTON. They could not do it without coming to Congress and the Appropriations Committee. [Cries of "Regular order."]

Mr. GOSS. If the regular order is to be demanded, I will object to the next four bills, for they are all alike.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I think the gentleman from Connecticut should be permitted to discuss the bills, and I trust that no Member on this side will insist on the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the statute the gentleman read, that is permanent law. All of these bills under the ruling of the Comptroller General require them to come to the Committee on Appropriations to get the money before they can do anything.

Mr. GOSS. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

Mr. WALLGREN. I will say that at the present time the district engineer has all the information necessary. There is no other expense to the Government.

Mr. GOSS. I am not objecting to the authorization, but it is the method of doing it. I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the matter should go to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CULKIN. Does this apply to navigation in any sense?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. No; it relates to flood control alone, the same as the other bills of a similar character which have been passed in this and past sessions, and will enable the Corps of Army Engineers to conduct the examinations and surveys for flood control out of the moneys already appropriated to the War Department.

Mr. GOSS. Would not the language "authorized and directed" be construed as an appropriation?

Mr. BLANTON. No. An appropriation requires the language "there is hereby appropriated so much money out of the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. SINCLAIR. If the gentleman will yield, I had a similar bill to this not long ago, and similar language was used.

Mr. GOSS. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I appreciate the cooperation of the gentleman from Connecticut, as these bills are of considerable importance to the citizens of southwest Washington, who will be benefited by proper protective measures against future floods, which we hope will result from these surveys by the Corps of United States Army Engineers having jurisdiction of rivers and harbors.

There being no further objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Cowlitz River and its tributaries in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DIRECT LOANS TO INDUSTRY

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following resolution for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 388 (Rept. No. 1722)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3487, a bill relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order, the substitute amendment, and any other amendments recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule providing for the consideration of the bill reported this morning from the Committee on Banking and Currency, providing for loans to industry. Under the program it will be taken up tomorrow the first thing after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the Senate bill already passed.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And it is expected that the bill will be passed some time tomorrow?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is hoped that it may be. Two hours of general debate are provided, and then an open rule under the 5-minute rule.

EXAMINATION OF CHEHALIS RIVER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9431, to provide a preliminary examination of Chehalis River and its tributaries in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Chehalis River and its tributaries in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST ELECTRO-METALLURGICAL CO., ETC.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar No. 306, H.R. 9269, limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain proceedings against the Electro-Metallurgical Co., New-Kanawha Power Co., and the Carbon & Carbide Co., and substitute therefor a similar Senate bill (S. 3436).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman seen the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I have, and he told me he had no objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Clerk will report the Senate bill, S. 3436.

The Clerk read the Senate bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States", approved March 4, 1909, as amended (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203), or in section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U.S.C., title 5, sec. 99), or in any other act of Congress forbidding officers or employees or former officers or employees of the United States from acting as counsel, attorney, or agent for another before any court, department, or branch of the Government or from receiving or agreeing to receive compensation therefor, shall be deemed to apply to attorneys or counselors to be specially employed, retained, or appointed by the Attorney General or under authority of the Department of Justice to assist in the prosecution of any case or cases, civil or criminal, to be brought by the United States against the Electro Metallurgical Co., New-Kanawha Power Co., or the Union Carbide and Carbon Corporation, or all or any of said companies and/or their officers or agents, and/or any litigation involving hydroelectric power, navigation, or water rights or claims upon the New and Kanawha Rivers, or either of them, under the Federal Water Power Act or the River and Harbor Appropriation Act of March 3, 1899, chapter 425, or any other act or acts.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DISABILITY OF SENIOR CIRCUIT JUDGES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 7356, to provide, in case of the disability of senior circuit judges, for the exercise of their powers and the performance of their duties by the other circuit judges, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, after "illness", insert "or other cause".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

EXAMINATION OF LEWIS RIVER, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9432, to provide a preliminary examination of the Lewis River and its tributaries in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Lewis River and its tributaries in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

H.R. 5522—AMENDING THE STANDARD BASKET ACT OF AUGUST 31, 1916, TO PROVIDE FOR A 1-POUND CLIMAX BASKET FOR MUSHROOMS

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill H.R. 5522, passed today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced, actively supported, and urge the passage of this bill in the hope and belief that by its passage we will have made a valuable contribution to the development of the mushroom industry.

The Standard Container Act of August 31, 1916, established that standards for Climax baskets for grapes and other fruits and vegetables shall be the 2-quart basket, 4-quart basket, and 12-quart basket, respectively. This standardization was made to meet the requirements then confronting the shippers of grapes, tomatoes, cherries, and other fruits and vegetables; and although at that time mushrooms were grown in the United States, the industry was not then of sufficient commercial value and importance to attract the attention of the framers of the 1916 act.

The mushroom industry has grown and developed in this country to one of imposing and commercial importance. The 4-quart Climax basket in the beginning served as a suitable container for the shipment of mushrooms, and held about 3 pounds. But since mushrooms are sold and retailed in pounds, changes in marketing, economic, and general merchandising conditions, have all necessitated the adoption of a 1-pound consumer package. Therefore the Climax basket containing 1 pound of mushrooms—approximately 1⅓ quarts—was designed. This package was tried commercially and met with encouraging success; it at once facilitated and helped develop a greater mushroom market and brought back to the grower an appreciable price margin. However, the Department of Agriculture claiming this 1-pound package to be a violation of the Standard Container Act of 1916, directed the discontinuance of its use. Since that time mushrooms have sold at less than the cost of production, and their sale has diminished.

If the mushroom industry is to survive, the grower must expand his market and get a better price margin by the adoption and use of a suitable consumer package. Practically every commercial concern in the mushroom belt has tried every type of consumer package, and the 1-pound Climax basket, for which this bill provides, is the most practicable from a merchandising point of view for mushrooms and will greatly aid in widening and extending the market.

The mushroom industry in the United States is a growing and valuable one. It needs and must have encouragement. The mushroom belt, scattered throughout Chester, Lancaster, and Delaware Counties, Pennsylvania, and extending into Maryland and New Jersey, produces annually in excess of 15,000,000 pounds of mushrooms, and this does not include the large tonnage that is canned. This represents almost 65 percent of the entire United States mushroom production. This industry, furnishing as it does employment for hundreds of workers in the plants, in transportation by truck and rail, and in its allied industries.

The necessity for prompt action on this bill is apparent because the shipment of fresh mushrooms will begin in September and continue throughout the coming winter. If the bill is not passed at this session, it means that this 1-pound mushroom package cannot be used for next season.

EXAMINATION OF COLUMBIA RIVER, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9433, to provide a preliminary examination of Columbia River and its tributaries in the State of Washington with a view to the control of its flood waters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Columbia River and its tributaries in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled

"An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore and hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOTT: Page 1, line 5, after the word "the", strike out the word "State" and insert in lieu thereof the word "States"; in line 6, after word "Washington", insert the words "and Oregon."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

WHITE SWAN SCHOOL DISTRICT, NO. 88, YAKIMA COUNTY, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7361, to provide funds for cooperation with White Swan School District, No. 88, Yakima County, Wash., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children of the Yakima Reservation.

Mr. TRUAX. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there are 10 bills, the next 10 bills on the calendar, which deal with the same subject, namely, improvement of the school situation among the Indians. I wonder if we cannot consider these and clear them up so that we can proceed more rapidly and save some time? I should like to ask a few questions. First, I should like to ask whether in each of these bills it is not true that the expense for the improvement is paid out of the Indian fund, and do those expenses come from the United States?

Mr. AYERS of Montana. These funds come from the United States Treasury, but these are not in a strict sense appropriation bills—they are authorization bills.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is the next question I wanted to ask.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. They are authorizations, and they will have to go through the general Appropriations Committee before they can be listed in the Budget and come out of the general fund.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have not had time to read all of the reports. How many of these are there?

Mr. AYERS of Montana. There are 13 of them.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. How are they as to similarity?

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, all of these bills are similar. If the House will bear with me I will explain the condition pertaining to all of these bills. They were referred to a subcommittee of which I was chairman, and we have gone into extensive hearings and investigations with reference to each bill. All of these measures are for extension of public-school buildings on and immediately adjacent to Indian reservations. The purpose is to accommodate Indian children where the Indian department has abandoned the Indian schools that heretofore cared for these Indian children.

Please understand that nothing in any of these bills has to do with the help or assistance of white children, except that they are overcrowded by Indian enrollment. All of these bills are important in the matter of providing proper educational facilities for Indian children since the Indian schools were suspended. In all of the instances which these bills are designed to reach, it has been the policy of the Indian Office to suspend their schools and provide for the education of the Indian children in the public schools of the State. This policy has been in progress for some time, and where practiced it has produced very satisfactory results and has been adopted as the general policy of the Indian Office where it can adopt such policy.

I am glad to say to the House that there is no race prejudice existing in the school districts of the public schools affected by these bills. The school boards in every instance have had full and complete cooperation with the white patrons of the schools and no protest is made by the white children or the parents of the white children with reference to Indian children attending the public State schools. That is a remarkable cooperation on the part of the trustees and the white patrons and is an advantage for the Indian children that the proponents of all of these bills are trying to perpetuate. In fact, the various State public schools have displayed a very commendable spirit of cooperation with the Indian Office in putting this policy into general operation.

The Indian Department pays tuition for the Indian children, which is designed to meet the expenses of teachers' salaries and other ministerial overhead expense, but according to facts gathered from some of the schools where the Indian children are permitted to attend, this tuition only pays about 85 percent of such ministerial overhead expense. The school districts are willing to waive that deficit if they can be helped by the Government in furnishing the additional quarters necessary for the increased enrollment caused by shifting the Indian children from the Indian schools to the public schools. That is the purpose of these bills.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will understand that this increased enrollment caused by the Indian children being transferred to the public schools is not taken care of by State apportionments of school moneys and that the lands upon which these Indian children live is not subject to taxation—it, being reservation land, is not subject to State or other taxes. Because of this fact the districts are hard-pressed to provide additional buildings and facilities for the increased Indian attendance.

As a matter of fact, all of the schools involved in these bills are overcrowded to the extent that they are inadequate and unfit to handle the additional enrollment; however, every district in the cases involved have gone their absolute limit in providing and attempting to provide adequate quarters. Some of them have even gone so far that they have jeopardized their own outstanding bonds.

Because of the importance of these bills and the seriousness of the situation, a special subcommittee was appointed to consider them and to endeavor to expedite their approval. This subcommittee has consulted with the Indian Office, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has openly, before the entire Indian Affairs Committee of the House, approved of these bills and assured us that they were in accord with the educational policy of the Indian Office. The Secretary of the Interior has approved of the plan. As a matter of fact, it is by reason of the action of these officers in their educational program that these bills become necessary.

The position of the Secretary of the Interior is illustrated by a few excerpts from letters which he wrote to the House Committee on Indian Affairs in response to its request for his views upon these measures. I shall quote only briefly from some of his letters which are typical of others:

It is quite apparent that a good central school building is required for this district and that use of the old log building should be discontinued. As a majority of the pupils will be Indian children, a contribution by the Federal Government of one half the cost of construction appears clearly justified when the condition of the Federal Treasury will permit such an appropriation.

From the foregoing brief summary of the facts it is evident that this public-school district is confronted with a peculiarly Indian problem, inasmuch as about 90 percent of the acreage of the district consists of nontaxable Indian land, whether used by Indian allottees or by white or Japanese lessees, and more than half of the school enrollment and attendance is Indian.

Because of the lack of space at Marysville itself and crowded conditions there, it has been necessary to make over part of the old boarding-school plant and to transport public-school pupils, both white and Indian. This is a very necessary school. The district reports that its bonded indebtedness has reached the limit allowed by State law and that it is unable to finance the necessary construction. It is desired to build an addition to the present plant to provide perhaps six classrooms and thus enable the school better to conduct both its elementary and high-school work. The need of this additional space has been brought to the attention of the Indian Office in reports from field officials who have recommended that Government assistance be thus extended.

Mr. Speaker, the only stumbling block in any of the departments that the subcommittee or the whole committee have found is that the Secretary says that the Director of the Budget stated that the proposed expenditures were not in accord with the financial program of the President.

The subcommittee and the entire Indian Affairs Committee of the House were faced with the situation as illustrated, and both the Subcommittee and the Committee on Indian Affairs reported these unanimously for passage. They felt that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs were fully aware of the actualities in the various school districts and more sympathetically alive to the human side of the case and to the educational problems facing the Indian children than was the Bureau of the Budget, and not a dissenting voice was raised against any of these measures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only objection to considering all of these bills en bloc is that there are not similar Senate bills. They cannot therefore be considered en bloc.

Mr. SINCLAIR. They have not all been passed by the Senate, however.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would have to be definitely informed as to the similarity of the bills.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Then I understand the bills are not similar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that they are, but the Chair has no definite information.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. What is the information as to how many of them have passed the Senate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that seven bills similar to the ones on the calendar have passed the Senate.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Eight of these bills have passed the Senate; that is, eight companion bills have passed the Senate, and therefore it would be impossible to omnibus this list of 13 bills and consider them as one. Each bill authorizes a different sum and for different school districts.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It is apparent that we cannot save time at this juncture, and therefore I will withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are 10 of these bills that appropriate the sum of $511,000—more than a half million dollars.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Is it not true that it is an authorization and not an appropriation?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; but that means an appropriation, does it not?

Mr. GOSS. Oh, no.

Mr. TRUAX. Well the point I raise is: What are we going to do for our schools in the rest of the States, where they are in distress right now? In the State of Ohio we are faced with a deficit of some $70,000,000 and no means have been provided for raising the revenue. The legislature is not in session. Are we to authorize an appropriation today of more than a half million dollars for these Indian schools in the northwestern territory and do nothing for the schools back in our States that will soon have to close?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The schools in Ohio at least have the abiilty of taxing the lands and property adjacent to the schools.

Mr. TRUAX. No; they have not, because they are taxed to death now.

Mr. SINCLAIR. But they have the power of taxation just the same.

Mr. TRUAX. But that does not raise money.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The lands connected with these schools are held in reserve by the Government for the Indians and are not subject to taxation, yet all the expense of educating these children is borne by the local community.

Mr. TRUAX. We have the power to tax public utilities and wealth, but we do not do it, because the Governor will not do it and the legislature will not do it.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Why do you not do it? You have the right.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Permit me to say to the gentleman that the situation is as follows: The Department has abandoned and closed the Indian schools in these instances and that has forced the Indian pupil into the State schools. That action has made the condition which we are seeking to relieve by these measures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, BROCKTON, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7146, to provide funds for the cooperation with the school board at Brockton, Mont., in the extension of the public-school building at that place to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MARYSVILLE SCHOOL DISTRICT, SNOHOMISH COUNTY, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7412, to provide funds for cooperation with Marysville School District, No. 325, Snohomish County, Wash., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I expect to object if we cannot clarify this situation, I think we should adopt some sort of a policy on these bills. There are more than 10 of them, and they are all just alike. They call for an enormous expenditure of money. In passing these bills the Federal Government puts itself on record by spending nearly three quarters of a million dollars for public schools for the Indians without any occasion for it; it is not at all necessary.

I am perfectly willing that all these bills be passed over without prejudice to the next call of the Consent Calendar.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, WOLF POINT, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6469, for expenditure of funds or cooperation with the public-school board at Wolf Point, Mont., in the construction or improvement of a public building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, BIG HORN COUNTY, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8342, to provide funds for cooperation with school district no. 27, Big Horn County, Mont., for extension of public-school buildings, to be available to Indian children.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, POPLAR, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5946, for expenditure of funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Poplar, Mont., in the construction or improvement of a public building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, QUEETS, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4864, to provide funds for cooperation with the school board at Queets, Wash., in the construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the village of Queets, Jefferson County, Wash.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to find out from the gentleman from Ohio just what it is he wants. It seems to me there is a general doubt and fog in the minds of everybody as to what the gentleman wants. If there is any clearing up to be done, it seems to be necessary on the other side.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I understand that the Department is not in favor of these bills; these bills do not have the endorsement of the Department. In addition to that several gentlemen alongside of me have indicated they would object on account of the expenditures involved. I think if one of these bills is passed that all of them should be passed.

I have already stated that we are called upon in these bills to make an enormous expenditure of money for the Indian children when every State in the Union is confronted with the situation of not having adequate funds to educate the white children.

The Department objects to these bills on the ground that the plan is too expensive and costly.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes on the subject of these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the Members of the House that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs have approved all of these bills. The only qualification is a clause at the end of their letters of approval, saying that this is not in accord with the program of the Bureau of the Budget; that is all.

The Committee on Indian Affairs appointed a special committee to consider these bills. Each one of them has been considered by this committee, and the history of the situation has been obtained in each one of these school districts. We found in each instance that the Secretary of the Interior has said the bill is meritorious. The officers in charge of Indian education in the Indian Bureau have made a report in some of these cases. I shall read you a sample of their recommendation in the case of the public school at Wolf Point. In their report on that school, made as far back as last November, they said:

> There is no question of the obligation of the Government—the attendance of Indian children has greatly increased at Wolf Point in the past 3 or 4 years—$50,000 is not too much with the future in view. I heartily recommend favorable action on the proposal of Superintendent Livingston if at all possible. Immediate action should be taken.

In other cases with which I am personally familiar will say that at Brockton on the Fort Peck Reservation 40 percent of the present enrollment are Indian children; at Poplar on the same reservation more than 60 percent of the present enrollment are Indian children; at Frazer on the same reservation 42 percent of the present enrollment are Indian children, and in this instance the school census, which is taken on children from 1 to 6 years of age and not yet enrolled, shows that next year this school will have a 52-percent Indian enrollment; at the agency on the Crow Reservation one third of the enrollment is Indian; and at Lodge Grass on the same reservation the Indian enrollment is over 36 percent.

In all of these instances the increased Indian enrollment has overcrowded these schools, and now is this Congress going to say to these State schools that they will have to provide educational buildings, without any help from the Government, to educate the wards of the Government, while at the same time each district is foregoing approximately 15 percent of the expense of teachers and other ministerial overhead?

In many instances the school districts absolutely cannot provide building facilities. They are already bonded to the limit, and someone will have to be excluded next year because of lack of housing facilities; and surely, under the circumstances, it will be the Indian children unless we can have the relief asked for by these measures.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But the point is that the Department says it is contrary to the policy inaugurated by the Director of the Budget, and contrary to the financial plan of the President.

Now, if you gentlemen on that side of the aisle want to spend money when the President does not want you to, that is up to you; but as for me, I shall follow the President in this.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. If we cannot get it through the Appropriations Committee, well and good; however, we will take our chance there. These Indian children have to be educated, and we are doing the best we can. For instance, I know by personal observation that both the white and Indian children are being taught, as at Brockton, Mont., in improvised buildings. Now, if Congress does not help in such instances, many will be kept out of school next year, and I am afraid it will be the Indian children who are living upon property not upon the tax rolls; therefore, I hope you will understand that I am speaking for the Indian children in such instance, and I am speaking first-hand, and in such instance I believe I am qualified to speak. These Indian children must be taken care of, and it is they for whom I am pleading today. I feel that if these bills are passed we will be able to have the Bureau of the Budget look at the humane and just side of it and include these improvements in the Budget.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Allow the bills to be passed over without prejudice until the next call of the Consent Calendar and we shall be pleased to make an investigation and go into the matter.

Mr. TRUAX. How many children are involved?

Mr. AYERS of Montana. I do not have it calculated as a total for all but I can give it in each instance, and then it is simply a matter of totaling.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] be allowed to proceed for 2 minutes to explain a further phase of this situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, I do not care for 5 minutes, or even for 2 minutes. I simply desire to call the attention to the fact that what is proposed here is a substitute school plan to take care of the Indian children. At the present time they are educated largely in boarding schools which are maintained by the Government at great expense. Attendance of the Indian children at these schools necessitates taking them far from their homes.

Under the plan here proposed Indian children would be educated in cooperation with the white schools near their homes, and they would receive better education. This plan would save a great deal of money to the Government that it has been spending on the Indian boarding schools remote from the homes of the Indian children. If the Government's financial participation is properly protected, this plan should produce more for the money than the policy heretofore followed by the Federal Government. I believe it is a humane and intelligent plan for the Government to adopt in taking care of the Indian education problem.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does the gentleman see any hardship in passing it over until we have time to study the matter further? We will have another call of this calendar.

Mr. LEA of California. Delay for a short time will be no hardship unless it will defeat action at this session of the Congress.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. We will have another calendar call.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Do these bills relate to nonreservation Indian boarding schools?

Mr. LEA of California. Not entirely. They are to take care of the resident Indians in connection with the public schools.

Mr. MOTT. Are they on reservations?

Mr. LEA of California. No; not necessarily. Some will serve reservation Indians.

Mr. MOTT. Are these bills introduced pursuant to the authorization in a bill passed here some time ago, of which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] was the author?

Mr. LEA of California. These bills are separate and they stand largely on the recommendation of the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who have proposed this plan as a better policy for taking care of the Federal Government's problem in connect with the schooling of Indian children.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these bills be the first bills to be considered upon Monday, a week from now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I rise to make the observation that the gentleman's request will probably conflict with a lot of things the leader might want to bring up, if this matter comes up next Monday week. We will have a call of the Consent Calendar before that time. I should like to have the gentleman modify his request so that it will come up at the next call of the Consent Calendar. We may have a calendar call before next Monday week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Consent has already been given for next Monday.

Mr. BLANTON. No. I object, Mr. Speaker; I thought it was a week from next Monday that the gentleman requested. His request was not understood; there was so much confusion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's objection comes too late unless he asks unanimous consent to return to the prior action of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that we reconsider that action.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the request of the gentleman from Washington is absolutely doing away with District day. The District legislation is entitled to some consideration and we have promised the District Committee that we will give consideration to District bills next Monday.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the request of the gentleman from Washington. This is a matter that ought not to have been concluded without consulting the majority leader. It may interfere with his plans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In view of the apparent confusion and misunderstanding as to the possible Monday that was meant, the Chair will return to the request of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request, if it is for a week from today.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to object to the arbitrary action of the Chair in returning, upon his own initiative, to the gentleman's request; and I may say that if the Speaker had been absolutely fair a while ago, we would not be in this dilemma.

Mr. BLANTON. He is one of the fairest young Speakers we have ever had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was merely trying to follow the wishes of the House in making such decision.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bills referred to be the first bills considered on the next Consent Calendar day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. GLOVER. I object.

THE NATIONAL GUARD IN THE AMERICAN MILITARY DEFENSE SYSTEM

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech, delivered by myself at national meeting of National Guard of the United States held in Chicago, Ill., September 1933:

It is, indeed, a very great pleasure and a rare privilege to address this body of citizen soldiers who play such an important role in our military defense. It has been an inspiration to me to observe the progress of the National Guard over the past few years, and it has always been a pleasure to help promote that progress. It has also been a pleasure to sit around the table with your representatives and discuss your requirements with General Leach, your most able chief of bureau.

Last year our committee recommended every dollar the representatives of your association asked for the fiscal year 1934 and allowed $2,200,000 additional for armory drills and for the full conduct of the June camps this year. Much of the money appropriated has been taken away from you because of Executive restrictions and limitations. The fact that you are meeting the situation so courageously is to the everlasting credit of the National Guard.

The reduction in the number of pay drills from 48 to 36 is unfortunate and should be corrected.

I was pleased to see the National Guard bill, in which I was deeply interested and to which I gave considerable study, enacted into law in June. It fixes your status more satisfactorily than you have heretofore enjoyed and preserves the identity of your organization. The guard should have the independence and initiative intended by the Constitution and should not be restricted and curbed by the Regular Army, as was done in the National Defense Act.

I am informed that this summer's camps were the best ever held in the history of the National Guard. Your association urged that these camps should be operated at full capacity, and this advice was followed. Your excellent judgment has been borne out by the results, and I know that this is a source of satisfaction to you.

I do not like the idea of executive departments making appropriations for regular governmental activities, but since this is the order of the day I hope that the National Guard construction program, on the basis of the $5,000,000 on which you have estimated, will be allowed. You have a building program which will practically complete your camp installations. Now, that the War Department has received its allotment of funds, it may be that the National Guard will come in for its modest share.

Last year your chief of bureau came to our committee with a proposition to motorize the light field artillery of the National Guard. Today about half of the light field artillery of the Guard has been motorized. Motorization of the field artillery is the big step forward in the program of military defense since the World War. I always like to dwell on the topic of modernization of armies and its relation to military defense.

It is a truism that every war is different from the one for which the so-called "experts" prepare. The war the generals always get ready for is the previous war. In commenting on this statement a leading authority denies its correctness. The war, he states, that the General Staff prepares for is, unfortunately, not even the last war, but the one before the last.

The truth of this observation is borne out by the conditions previous to the World War. Then preparations based on previous wars were in progress. Certain developments could easily have been foreshadowed, but these were totally ignored. The paralyzing effect of gunfire, the hopelessness of frontal attacks, the consequent development of enormous trench systems, of grenades, and of high-explosive shells; all these developments were ignored in the pre-war preparations.

Obsolete and ill-advised methods of preparation for war, some of us hope to eliminate. We have been making progress at a snaillike pace. In the face of these facts must we be blamed for insisting on innovations? Must we be abused for demanding the discontinuance of useless weapons and meaningless methods? Is it not the sane and safe policy to insist that we profit by our war experience?

The same drill, the same system of marksmanship and musketry based on the rifle, the same divisional organization of the Infantry troops, and the same insistence on mere numbers are still with us. In fact, we are confronted by almost the whole pre-war system in our present-day Army system.

France has an enormous number of men under its conscript system. Germany, in comparison with France, has an army small in numbers. Yet France fears attack from Germany. France argues, and rightly so, that it is not numbers, but the potential power of a nation that counts; that Germany, a scientific nation is potentially stronger than the man-power army of France.

Yet, we in the United States generally use the French system as a basis of comparison. In developing our defensive military power we have neglected our potential strength. We have ignored the fact that we are the greatest scientific and industrial nation in the world. We are not planning for the use of armored fighting vehicles, but rather for the sending into battle of unprotected men fighting on foot or horseback. We have not, and are not now, making use of our scientific and industrial preeminence in equipping our Army.

It is with this idea in mind that I have urged the motorization and mechanization of our military forces. I have insisted that as we are the greatest scientific and industrial Nation our military defensive should feel the influence of this scientific and industrial leadership. Military conservatism has too long been allowed to retain masses of slow-moving, slow-shooting, expensively massed troops. These antiques must yield to motorized and mechanized forces.

The substitution of motor-propelled vehicles for animal-drawn ones in the supply echelons of all branches of the Army; the substitution of automotive transport for foot movements; and the application of mechanics directly to the combat soldier on the battlefield must be our immediate objective.

It is obvious that motorization and mechanization have revolutionized warfare. The purpose of the mechanized force is to provide a powerful, fast-moving weapon, capable of wide maneuverability, which combines fire-power, speed, and shock to a much greater degree than now exists in the older arms. It is ideally organized for mobility and surprise. It is simply the substitution of the 2½-mile-per-hour infantry masses and the 6-mile-per-hour cavalry by a fast-moving armored force capable of striking suddenly and quickly, and by means of its extreme mobility repeating its blow from another direction.

Obviously, as mechanization develops, the whole Army reorganization will have to be considered, since the old-fashioned foot soldier is helpless against tanks working in cooperation with an air squadron. But, I regret to state that, in spite of these modern developments, the necessary changes are not being made. Our Army is limited, properly and necessarily, by the amount of money authorized for it by Congress. But, of the sum available, comparatively little goes for modern equipment. The military authorities determine how the sum available to them can best be spent to insure national safety. Yet, when we realize that the large percentage of the money appropriated is for personnel to almost the total neglect of mechanized equipment, and when we see money used on the transient training of high-school boys and drill-ground maneuvers and single-shot rifles, we are somewhat shaken in the belief in the good judgment of our General Staff.

In all this the National Guard has a valuable contribution to make to the national defense of this country. Obviously, the professional soldier has difficulty adjusting himself to the changing conditions and the new methods even within his own field. The mind is not easily adjusted. It seems to me that the citizen-soldier could make up for this defect of the professional soldier. It should be the task of the members of the National Guard to acquaint themselves with modern methods of defense and your organization act as a clearing house for information on all matters pertaining to defense and reorganization.

More than that, the National Guard itself should act as a group for experimentation. Experiments applied by the National Guard in the light of the latest available information on problems of warfare would obviate the necessity of making costly experiments on the field of battle.

Another factor should be taken into consideration in connection with this problem of modernization. The military policy of this Nation has as its basis the National Defense Act. This act was written at a time before the lessons of the World War could be learned. It is based on the idea of mere numbers and has not been influenced by the modern developments in warfare. The military policy of this country should be written into another defense act so that the policy of this Nation may be based, not on personnel, but on a proper balance between personnel and matériel. If the military leaders were alive to our lack of matériel as are those of the other highly scientific and industrial countries of the world, we would cast aside the National Defense Acts of 1916 and 1920 with their emphasis on personnel, and write a new defense act in keeping with recent developments in military science.

I am convinced that motorization and mechanization are essential to our national defense. Consequently, General Leach had little difficulty in convincing me that the National Guard should be motorized.

I cannot let this occasion pass without paying tribute to your chief. In this respect I desire to quote from a statement I made in Congress during the heat of debate when the Army appropriation bill was under consideration:

"General Leach is a Republican, appointed by a Republican President. I will say this to his everlasting credit: That he is a gentleman and a high-class soldier. He is trying to administer the National Guard in an economical manner, and is actually doing it. Notwithstanding the fact that he is a Republican, I should like to see the Democratic President-elect, Franklin D. Roosevelt, reappoint him to the position he now holds, because he is the best Chief of the Militia Bureau that I have ever known."

Gentlemen, I congratulate you on having in your organization so many forward-looking officers. It has been my privilege to know many of them. Such outstanding men as compose the membership of your legislative committee and many others I would name I constantly seek out for advice and help on military matters. It has been my pleasure to work with these men during the past years, and I have no hesitancy in stating that sincerity, straightforwardness, and open-mindedness of these and many other of your officers has made my work a real pleasure. I trust you realize how fortunate you are in having an organization officered by such able men.

I congratulate you on having a chief of bureau of the caliber of General Leach. And, finally, I congratulate you on your success in building this organization along correct lines and I wish you all the satisfaction that comes from the consciousness of successful achievement.

PUBLIC HIGH SCHOOL AT FRAZER, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5747, to authorize appropriations for the completion of the public high school at Frazer, Mont.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, BIG HORN, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8346, to provide funds for cooperation with school district no. 17-H, Big Horn County, Mont., for extension of public-school buildings to be available to Indian children.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL, COVELO, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8906, to provide funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Covelo, Calif., in the construction of public-school buildings to be available to Indian children of the Round Valley Reservation, Calif.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I say that my objection to this bill will be the same as to the others. I hope that when we call the calendar again we may be able to work out something to the advantage of the Indian school children. Mr. Speaker, I object.

COMPENSATION OF LETTER CARRIERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9595, to increase the compensation of letter carriers in the village delivery service.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if this bill has been approved by the Postmaster General?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. The original bill with higher salaries was not approved by the Department, but this bill reduces the salaries, and I have heard no objection to it.

Mr. TRUAX. Meets whose approval?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. It meets with the approval of the Post Office Department, I presume, as no objections have been registered against it, since it was amended.

Mr. TRUAX. I asked the gentleman whether it had been approved by the Postmaster General.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. It was not approved by the Post Office Department in its original form, but no objection has been raised since it was amended.

Mr. TRUAX. It has not been approved by the Postmaster General?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. His employees were sent before the committee and the subcommittee unanimously agreed to this report, and no objection was urged against it at that time.

Mr. Speaker, this bill merely increases the salaries of the village mail carriers, adding $250 to each salary.

The salaries now are $1,150, $1,250, and $1,350. They are increased by adding $250 to each salary, making the salaries $1,400, $1,500, and $1,600. This is a very small salary for these men who are doing practicaly the same work as the city carriers. The city carriers receive salaries ranging from $1,700 to $2,100.

This is a fair bill and these men ought to have these salaries.

Mr. TRUAX. What is the gentleman's definition of a village—how much population?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I do not know whether the statutes mention the population or not, but I believe a village has a population under 2,500.

Mr. TRUAX. I am not objecting to the bill and withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925 (U.S.C., title 39, sec. 106), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. Carriers in the village delivery service shall be graded with salaries for each grade, as follows: First grade, $1,400; second grade, $1,500; third grade, $1,600. That in the readjustment of salaries of letter carriers in the village delivery service to conform to the grades herein provided, village carriers who have served as such for 2 years or more shall be placed in grade 3; village carriers who have served for 1 but less than 2 years shall be placed in grade 2; and village carriers when they receive their regular appointments shall be placed in grade 1. In determining the aggregate period of service upon which promotions are to be based, all time served as letter carrier in the village delivery service is to be included: Provided, That hereafter substitute carriers in the village delivery service when appointed regular carriers shall have credit for actual time served on a basis of 1 year for each 306 days of 8 hours served as substitute, and appointed to the grade to which such carrier would have progressed had his original appointment as substitute been to grade 1: Provided further, That letter carriers in the village delivery service shall be promoted successively after 1 year's satisfactory service in each grade to the next higher grade until they reach the third grade. All promotions shall be made at the beginning of the quarter following 1 year's satisfactory service in the grade. The pay of substitute letter carriers in the village delivery service shall be at the rate of 65 cents per hour."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on July 1, 1934.

There are hereby excluded from the reservation as above defined all lands heretofore designated by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to section 28 of the Arizona Enabling Act of June 20, 1910 (36 Stat.L. 575), as being valuable for water-power purposes and all lands withdrawn or classified as power-site lands, saving to the Indians, nevertheless, the exclusive right to occupy and use such designated and classified lands until they shall be required for power purposes or other uses under the authority of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as authorizing the payment of proceeds or royalties to the Navajo Indians from water power developed within or adjacent to the boundaries defined by this act; and the Federal Water Power Act of June 10, 1920 (41 Stat.L. 1063), and amendments thereto, shall operate for the benefit of the State of Arizona as if such lands were vacant, unreserved, and unappropriated public lands. In all selections of lieu lands under section 2 of this act notice to any interested party shall be by publication. Any privately owned lands relinquished to the United States under section 2 of this act shall be held in trust for the Navajo Tribe of Indians; and relinquishments in Navajo County, Ariz., excluding Indian allotments and selections, shall not extend south of the township line between townships 20 and 21 north, Gila and Salt River base and meridian. SEC. 3. Upon the completion of exchanges and consolidations authorized by section 2 of this act, the State of Arizona may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, relinquish to the United States such of its remaining school lands in Coconino, Navajo, and Apache Counties as it may see fit; and shall have the right to select from the vacant, unreserved, and nonmineral public lands in said counties lieu lands equal in value to those relinquished without the payment of fees or commissions.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 9618, authorizing the Sistersville Bridge Board of Trustees to finance, construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at Sistersville, Tyler County, W.Va.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will suspend the calling of the Consent Calendar.

GEORGE W. HESS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], who is absent, Chairman of the Committee on the Library, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate Joint Resolution 94, to retire George W. Hess as Director Emeritus of the Botanic Garden.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolution, etc., That George W. Hess, Director of the United States Botanic Garden, is hereby retired from active service in such position, and shall hereafter be carried on the rolls of the legislative branch of the Government with the title of Director Emeritus and Consultant of the United States Botanic Garden, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $3,000 per annum, payable monthly out of funds appropriated for expenses of the Botanic Garden.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York to 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], Chairman of the Committee on the Library, was called away, and he asked me, on behalf of himself and his committee, to call up this Senate resolution under suspension. The Speaker had already agreed to recognize him. This Senate resolution has been passed by the Senate, and I understand it has the unanimous report of the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] had asked him to do this?

Mr. BLANTON. No; Mr. KELLER, the chairman of the committee. Mr. LUCE is the ranking minority member and the former Chairman of the Library Committee, and the bill was reported out favorably by that committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is not this the bill that was on the Consent Calendar this afternoon?

Mr. BLANTON. No; that is a different bill. The bill that was on the Consent Calendar this afternoon was one that provided for a commission to investigate the advisability of transferring the Botanic Garden to the Agricultural Department. At the request of Mr. LUCE, I asked to have that bill passed over without prejudice.

This is a Senate resolution, passed unanimously by the Senate. I do not believe there has ever been any employee of the Government since I have been in Washington who has devoted more of his time and his attention and his very soul to the work that he had to perform than has this Director of the Botanic Garden, Mr. George W. Hess. It is the custom in all large cities having gardens of this kind to provide just such measures as this after a man has spent his lifetime in the service as Director.

While I am for strict economy and I believe in safeguarding every dollar in the people's Treasury, yet I believe in rewarding faithful service of this kind in the small way proposed in this Senate joint resolution. Director Hess is to be retired July 1. He has been in charge of this Botanic Garden for the past 28 years. If this Senate resolution is not passed, he will receive only $80 per month after July 1. I sincerely believe that with his years of knowledge and experience the value of keeping this expert on as a consultant after July 1 will be worth to the Government far more than the pay provided for in this Senate resolution.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, this Mr. Hess will be retired the same as any other civil-service employee if this bill is not passed.

Mr. BLANTON. But on a pay so small that he could not possibly exist on it.

Mr. DOWELL. It is about $1,200 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am informed he will receive only $80 per month, with his house taken away, and he will have to live entirely on his small retired pay. If he could stay on 2 years longer he would receive $1,200 per year.

Mr. DOWELL. That is the amount paid every employee in the Government who retires. The gentleman is one of those who is always trying to save every penny for the Government that he can.

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman has done great service in that respect.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], chairman of the committee, assured me that this Senate resolution is a meritorious measure, that this man had given his life to the service and he is now in extremely poor health, and there is no extravagance whatever in the proposal, as all other directors of like public gardens of similar size are similarly retired and made expert consultants.

Mr. DOWELL. But we have not done this for anyone else.

Mr. BLANTON. This director is an employee in a particular class, all to himself. Every other big city in the United States does this for its public garden director. That is the answer that was given me by the chairman of the committee. When a bill of this kind passes the Senate unanimously, and is unanimously approved by a House committee that has upon it such friends of ours as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and others, I feel there must be merit in it, and I am convinced there is no extravagance in it. As to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], former chairman of this committee, I want to say that he is a partisan Republican, and is a spokesman for the Republican Party in this House, but I believe he is one of the most honorable men, one of the most courageous and valuable men who has ever sat in this Congress. [Applause.] I have watched him many times. I have watched him make some partisan fights for you Republicans when I thought he was as mean as the devil, representing his party on this floor, but I have nevertheless admired him and am his friend.

He is an astute parliamentarian, and whenever you gentlemen across the aisle get into a tight box and start to milling around, you call upon him to help you out, and when such men as Mr. LUCE on the Republican side, who was chairman of this committee, and Mr. KELLER, the present chairman, and our other friends on the Library Committee report a bill of this kind out unanimously, I feel that it cannot be very unsound.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. I noted the other day when we were trying to get a small pension for those who are unable to take care of themselves, the gentleman was the principal objector to that character of legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you know why?

Mr. DOWELL. Now the gentleman is here asking for a pension of $3,000 a year for one man.

Mr. BLANTON. No; not a pension, but annual pay for an expert consultant, who will earn it all. The gentleman does not know what that pension bill he mentioned would have cost the 48 States, without any benefit to them. In the first place, it was a District of Columbia measure, applicable only to the people who live here in Washington. It was not for Iowa or Texas. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia were against it. They sent up a statement here that their financial budget would not stand it. They did not want it. Suppose the Congress had passed it and had placed on the people of the District, who are helpless and without a voice in this Congress, a financial burden of this kind which their Commissioners said their budget would not stand financially, then they would be coming here asking the Congress to furnish the money. And the people of Iowa and Texas would have been taxed for it, without receiving any benefit at all. Now, as far as an old-age pension is concerned, I am for it whenever the time comes that we can pass it nationally. Whenever the country is able to stand it, and the President and the Director of the Budget say we can stand it, I am ready to pass it; but to take care of the kind of beneficiaries who would be recipients under that bill in Washington, many of them already drawing retired pay, I do not think would have been right, and I wanted to hold it off until we had a proper survey of it, a bill properly framed before us, and the country ready for it.

Yet I saw in the paper the other day a criticism from a man who calls himself Dr. J. E. Pope—a man whose record in the penitentiary and in Federal courts answering prosecutions of this country ought to cause him to keep his mouth shut. He is a man who has no right to open his mouth publicly. Just the other day the Post Office Department stopped him from sending his stuff through the United States mails.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my friend.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman has spoken beautifully and learnedly and intelligently for 10 or 15 minutes and has complimented the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he has talked about everything else. It so happens that I do not have a copy of the bill before me, and I should like to have the gentleman tell me what is in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. It provides that when Director George W. Hess retires on July 1 he will become an expert consultant and draw retirement pay that is accorded by every big city to its garden director, which is $3,000 a year. If ever a man earned that kind of pay it is Director George W. Hess, who has put his soul into this work for the last 28 years, and whose great knowledge and matchless experience as an expert consultant will be well worth such pay to the Government.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Is not any man who works for the Government supposed to put his soul into his work? We have had too many chiselers who do not put their soul into their work.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; every employee should put his soul into his work. But nevertheless the Government is afflicted with thousands of disinterested clock watchers. The gentleman from Michigan puts his soul into his work and I put mine into it, and when I see another man like Director George W. Hess doing it I am willing to accord him some little recognition, when he has done it for 28 years, and his continued service will be worth the money we pay him.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I do not want to saddle $3,000 a year onto the Government when I quit. I will provide for it myself.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman guarantee that nobody else who has been drawing a salary for 25 or 30 years from the Government will come here next session and make the same request to be excepted from our general retirement law? I have nothing against Mr. Hess, but I do believe that we will make a mistake if we undertake to make an exception in favor of one employee against hundreds of others who are possibly equally entitled to it. [Applause.] I know one man who has served for 35 years as faithfully as any employee this Government has ever had, and he told me last week that if this bill went through he felt he was entitled to consideration, just as you are undertaking to give to this gentleman, and that he was going to ask some of his friends to introduce a bill for that purpose.

If the Congress wants to set that sort of precedent, all right; but I do not think we can afford to set aside our retirement laws in favor of any one single individual. The gentleman from Texas is a real economist, and I am very fond of him personally, but I cannot go along with him in his support of this bill, much as I should like to do so, and much as I should like to favor my friend Mr. Hess. I regard it as a discrimination against others who are equally deserving.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I endorse everything the gentleman from Tennessee has said regarding the wisdom of not establishing a bad precedent and of showing no discrimination. As I said in the beginning, this is not my bill. It is a Senate resolution that passed the Senate unanimously. It was favorably reported unanimously by the Committee on the Library. I am not a member of that committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] is chairman of that committee. He could not be here today, on account of some very important matters, and he asked me as his friend to call up the measure for him. This I have done. It is before you gentlemen. It has my approval simply because I believe his years of experience and the expert knowledge possessed by Director George W. Hess gained from having put his very soul into this Botanic Garden for 28 long years, will be worth several times to the Government the pay that this measure proposes to give him as an expert consultant. I do not believe there is another such expert in this Capital available to the Government. It will be a great loss to lose him as a consultant.

Every man on this floor who knows him is a friend of George W. Hess. The opposition to this Senate resolution developed here is not against Hess, but is against what is deemed a discrimination in his favor, against the other 80,000 Government employees in Washington. There is apprehension that they will be made dissatisfied; that they will ask like favors; that this will become a bad precedent. I can see the force of such argument and apprehension. But I do not believe that it sets a precedent for others, or that it constitutes discrimination, for Director George W. Hess is in a class to himself. There is but one Director of the Botanic Garden in the United States. And he has been one of the most faithful public servants I have ever seen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

I am with our majority leader on not setting bad precedents, and I will vote against extending the Retirement Act, but this is not an extension of it, and that is the reason I agreed with Chairman KELLER to call up his measure for him and to support the bill. I found that every other big city puts its garden director in a class by himself and accords this treatment and gives this pay as an expert consultant.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. We do not do it in our city, and we are the fourth largest city in the country. They do not do it any more than all the rest of the rank and file.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman investigated about his great city of Detroit?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I know all about my great city. I am interested in it.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that they do not make their retiring director an expert consultant at a larger salary than the ordinary retired pay?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Indeed they do not. We would not allow them to. They are all in one class. We would not let them for a minute distinguish between classes, because they are all citizens and all entitled to their pension, whatever it is.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will find that the larger the salary drawn, the larger the retirement pay will be.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. It is probably like our schools, and our schools are worth more.

Mr. BLANTON. The committee tells me that this is no larger than the pay given by other large cities to their retiring director, retaining his services as an expert consultant.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I have known Mr. Hess ever since I have been a Member of Congress, for 20 years, and I know his service and his value to the Government. But I know that in 1920 we passed a bill establishing a civil-service retirement system. It was amended in 1926 and again in 1930. We have now what I believe to be as good a retirement system as any governing body in the world. For these 10 years we and the Committee on the Civil Service have protected this retirement system by refusing to report one single bill to make an exception of anybody. If you start to do it now, not only will you rip down and destroy your retirement system but you will also be legislating as a matter of favoritism and not in accordance with the broad policies that have been worked out and established in matters of this kind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is this gentleman, Mr. Hess, eligible for the benefits of the Civil Service Retirement Act?

Mr. LEHLBACH. He is if he has had the requisite service and has reached the requisite age. If he should be disabled, he would be eligible without reaching the age limit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New Jersey knows, if he has kept up with Mr. Hess, that instead of giving 7 hours a day as other civil-service employees do, Mr. Hess has many and many a time given 14 and 16 hours a day of work to the Government.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Why, he has given 24 hours a day, because he lives there.

Mr. BLANTON. He has been devoted to it, and, as a result, we have one of the finest botanic gardens in the world.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly; that is his job.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I presume most of the Members of the House have no more knowledge of this bill than I had a few minutes ago when I got a copy of Senate Joint Resolution 194. What it proposes to do is to retire George Hess from active service and put him on the Government rolls with the title of Director Emeritus and Consultant, United States Botanic Garden, and pay him a salary of $3,000 a year. Three thousand dollars a year is just three times as much as postal employees receive for working all the time; and it is proposed to pay him this amount as retirement pay.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman notices that Mr. Hess is still to be a consultant; and not a dollar of his retirement pay comes out of the retirement fund; it comes out of the appropriations for the Botanic Garden, which is made every year. This money does not come out of the retirement fund.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I cannot yield further; I am sorry.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. In the event this does not come out of the retirement fund and Mr. Hess is retired, he can draw down every cent he has contributed to the retirement fund.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. That is true. I am not in favor of this bill. I am not in favor of putting this man into a special class so he can chisel from the Government appropriations. He lives surrounded by flowers. He lives amongst the things he loves, and the Government has furnished him free living quarters. Who would not love to live in the Botanic Gardens and draw retirement pay of $3,000 a year?

It has been said that he works long hours. In some seasons of the year he may work 12 or 14 hours at one stretch, but who is there here who does not work 12 and 14 hours every day in the week? And there is not one of us who is going to be put on a Government pension roll.

I cannot see any reason on earth why we should put this man in a special class because he is the official flower and bouquet man. He has done a great deal to ingratiate himself into the hearts of many of the Members. He has sent flowers to their wives for parties. This is very beautiful, but it is a little practice in which I have not indulged at the expense of the taxpayers. It is probable that I have not been here long enough to learn how to chisel officially and I hope I never do, but still it is the little things that chisel into the Government that bring the costs up. They should be eliminated. Here is an opportunity to save the Government $3,000 a year.

I am not questioning the statements that Mr. Hess has done a wonderful work; but he has lived amongst his flowers and has not had a chance to spend his money. He ought to have enough now with which to take care of himself. When he accepted his position he entered into a contract with the Government of the United States to do his work at a stated salary. Having made that contract we should not now go beyond the scope of the contract and say to Mr. Hess: "We are going to give you $3,000 a year in addition because you have been a good fellow and sent us Government flowers free."

Mr. Speaker, I am against chiselers, whether they be big or little; I am for justice in these things.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. That is right.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, we have a Director of the Botanic Garden who has been getting a good salary. On top of that we have given him a beautiful house in which to live.

I do not get any bouquets. I do not want any. I do not know whether he has been sending bouquets to the other fellow or not. When I want one I stop along the streets and buy one like this.

Mr. Speaker, I hate to take the floor against my friend on a bill like this.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if there is going to be opposition to the bill I would not want to see it voted upon in the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], who is Chairman of the Committee on the Library, and reported this Senate bill.

I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill from present consideration, and to withdraw my motion.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, we have spent 15 minutes in the consideration of this bill; I object.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this is a special-privilege proposition, where we are trying to hand something out of the ordinary to somebody.

I do not believe we can without completely destroying our retirement system put one man in a different class from all the rest. If we are going to preserve this retirement system, we will have to maintain its integrity. We have provided an annuity, and Congress appropriates a lot of money every year for this purpose, so that our civilian employees may be properly retired and taken care of in their old age.

Why should we make an exception here? The minute we make an exception and hand a man $3,000 a year and all the contributions he has made to the retirement fund, with 4 percent, or whatever the rate is, immediately we get to the point where we will have to do it for everybody else. I do not think that this country and this Congress ought to get to that point. The thing that bothers me about taking this position is that the mover of the motion is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who has performed great service in this House for many years in saving money for the people, and I hate to see him sponsor a bill of this character.

I think we should beat this bill so that it is beaten and stays beaten and is off the floor for good and all. I think we ought not to allow such bills as this to come in here. No committee should be so derelict in its duty to the House and to its responsibilities as to bring up such a bill on the floor of this House.

We ought to send it back to that committee by beating the suspension in such a way and by such a majority that we never will have brought to us again a bill of this character, one that would destroy one of the main cogs in our Federal employment system. I hope that when the House comes to vote on this proposition, it will not only beat this bill but that the majority of the Members of this House will show their interest in protecting the Federal Treasury to such an extent that it will not be necessary to argue this question again.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST].

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to express on behalf of the Library Committee our sincere appreciation of the very fine tribute just paid to us by the gentleman from New York. I happen to be the youngest member of the committee, and I am the only member who happens to be present at this time. Whether that is intentional or not, I shall not say, but nevertheless it falls upon me to speak as nearly as I am able on behalf of the committee in reference to such things as may have motivated the committee in its action in reporting out this bill.

There has been, and there still is being heaped upon the Botanic Garden of the United States much criticism, not only by people within our own country, but by people interested in this work abroad. It was the hope of the Library Committee that a Botanic Garden might be developed that would be equal to the Library of Congress which has been developed through the years under the leadership and under the direction of the Library Committee.

We of that committee wondered in what manner we might be able to best proceed to this end. There was a resolution introduced taking the Botanic Garden from the Library Committee and placing it under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. A majority of the Congress, I believe, have alined themselves against this on previous occasions. In July the Botanic Garden will change hands and a new director will be appointed.

We have there at the present time a man who has given 25 or 30 years of his service toward the building up of a Botanic Garden on the one hand, while on the other the Congress of the United States has limited the appropriations until all that could be afforded were a few people who acted as common gardeners and the Botanic Garden here was no better than one that could be developed by a private individual with a small fortune at his command. A new Director of the Botanic Garden will be appointed. We gave considerable thought to the question of how we could retain the knowledge and the benefits of a man who had given all his time to such a garden as this, and the only alternative, it seemed to us, was to make him a consultant to the new Director of the Botanic Garden. He will not have authority to administer the Garden and will not be responsible for decisions which may be made, but he will be available at any time there is a need for his service by the new Director, and I know not at this time who the new Director may be.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SECREST. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas

Mr. McGUGIN. Why must a new Director be appointed?

Mr. SECREST. He has reached the age that makes it necessary to retire him.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman will retire and receive some retirement pay?

Mr. SECREST. The gentleman would retire at $80 a month, and I believe that any Member of Congress or anyone else is aware of the fact that no one can live on that income in Washington and still be a consultant.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Where did the gentleman get the information that his retirement would be $960 a year?

Mr. SECREST. Eighty dollars a month was the figure submitted to the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not think the gentleman's source of information is correct. Even a letter carrier gets $1,200.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SECREST. The figure given to the Library Committee was $80 a month.

There is this difference between the Director of the Botanic Garden and other Government employees in the same salaried class. The others are heads of divisions and employees of the Government who go home in the evening and their work is completed. Their salary can be used for living expenses. This man, time and again, has entertained people from all over the United States who came to visit him, not as an individual, but as the Director of the Botanic Garden. This gentleman entertained people not only from this Nation but from abroad, and I daresay from my knowledge of public life, that of the salary paid to him little, if any, remains upon which he might retire.

By retiring this man as a consultant, the benefit of all he may have learned in the past years remains with the Government. When he dies his salary stops. He does not receive the pension that would otherwise be provided, and I am sure there is no similar case, perhaps, in any department of the Government.

There is one more thing I may mention in this connection. Every botanic garden in the United States of major importance and every botanic garden in the world, including that of Great Britain, as well as many other countries, insofar as our committee investigation led, follows this method of retiring their directors when they are of such an age that they are not permitted by law to continue as director of the garden.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. SECREST. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Lest there be any mistake about his retirement pay, the minimum that any employee can get after 30 years of service, no matter how small his wages were, is $1,200 a year.

Mr. SECREST. I simply quoted what was submitted to our committee.

I think I have given in brief outline the thought of the committee when this measure was reported out.

Insofar as breaking down the retirement act is concerned, this measure appoints him as a consultant, and the only way you could similarly break down the retirement act for the benefit of a Government clerk or a mail carrier or any other individual would be to retain him as a consultant, which would be ridiculous.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have kept faith with my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], chairman of the committee having this Senate resolution in charge. I have called it up and placed it before you. I knew that it would meet with opposition from the civil-service organizations. It is a case of the many against the one. Director George W. Hess is in a class of one all to himself. He is the only Director of Botanic Garden in the United States. The Government of the United States has no other such employee. But the Government does have about 80,000 other employees in Washington who are all in another class together. They are afraid that this measure is unjust to them. They are apprehensive that it discriminates against them. They believe that to pay Director Hess any pay as an expert consultant after his retirement that is larger than their regular retirement pay is unjust and discriminatory.

I do not fall out with my colleagues who from this floor have taken the position outlined above. I admire them for being watchful to keep back bad precedents. They have the right to their opinions. And I can see that such sentiment is going to defeat this measure at this time. And that is the reason I asked unanimous consent to withdraw it from your consideration.

I do hope that President Roosevelt will exercise his privilege of suspending retirement of Director Hess for another year. That can be done. I hope all of you who appreciate George Hess will ask the President to do it. We cannot afford to lose his service on July 1. And after July 1, after serving us 28 years, he cannot support his family on only $80 per month, which will be all that he will receive after that date, and he will have to move out of the house in the Botanic Gardens.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Why does the gentleman make that assertion when he knows better?

Mr. BLANTON. What assertion?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That he will only get $80 a month.

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly what the committee told me, and I believe the committee. I believe Mr. LUCE, and I believe Mr. KELLER, and I believe Mr. SECREST, and they say he will receive $80 a month.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not a one of them has made that statement on his own responsibility.

Mr. BLANTON. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the committee, if that is not correct—that he will receive only $80 per month after July 1?

Mr. SECREST. That is what was presented to the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. What is his present salary?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield further, Mr. Speaker.

This man will get $960 retirement pay, which, divided by 12, means $80 a month. He is now a poor man, enfeebled in health, and will have to move out of his present quarters and rent a house in Washington for his family and buy all the necessities of life with $80 a month. And he has put his very heart and soul into this plant for 28 years, until he has built up the finest botanic garden in the United States. The above is what appealed to my heart and conscience. As an economist, I felt this was as little as we could do if we expected to use this valuable expert as a consultant for the rest of his life. Other large cities are doing the same thing, and in this way we would get the benefit of his valuable services for the rest of his life.

I have before me now the authentic data from Director Hess himself. After July 1 he will receive only $81 per month, which is just $1 more than the $80 I mentioned when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] asserted he would get much more. He gets $81 because he served only 28 years. If he had served 30 years, he would have gotten the $1,200 per year, or $100 per month, as asserted by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Bible says that "the laborer is worthy of his hire", and this one has been loyal, diligent, and faithful. The taxpayers at home are willing to do justice to this laborer. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 13, noes 65.

So (two thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was rejected.

OCMULGEE NATIONAL PARK, GA.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 342, H.R. 7653, to authorize the establishment of the Ocmulgee National Monument in Bibb County, Ga. The gentleman who objected has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Whereas the Federal Government, through the War Department, desires to cooperate with the representatives of the Canadian, British, and French Governments, and the State of New York, in the International Celebration to commemorate the fourth centenary of Jacques Cartier, the ratification of the Rush-Bagot Treaty in 1818, and the completion of the restoration of Old Fort Niagara, Niagara County, N.Y., as a historic and patriotic shrine symbolizing the history of the common interest of these nations in the evolution of the early American struggle and strife to a lasting peace of vast international significance: Therefore be it

JOE G. M'INERNEY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval H.R. 5542, entitled "An act for the relief of Joe G. McInerney."

The bill authorizes that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Coast Guard, their widows, children, and dependent relatives, Joe G. McInerney shall be held and considered to have been discharged under honorable conditions as a coal heaver from the cutter Forward on December 13, 1902, and provides that no back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

The records of the Treasury Department show that by order of the commanding officer of the revenue cutter Forward, Third Oiler Joseph G. McInerney was confined in the brig and disrated from third oiler to coal heaver as of December 10, 1902, for insolent and mutinous language to his superior officers and that in accordance with the approved findings and recommendations of a board of investigation convened by the commanding officer, he was released from confinement and discharged from the service December 13, 1902, by reason of insubordination and language tending toward the destruction of good order and military discipline.

The bill is objectionable as it would tend to break down the morale of the Service and be prejudicial to proper discipline to place the name of a man who had been dishonorably discharged for cause by proper authority, upon the list of honorably discharged members of the Coast Guard on the same plane with those who have rendered faithful service.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

MONETARY USE AND ACQUISITION OF SILVER (S.DOC. NO. 181)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

On January 11, 1934, I recommended to the Congress legislation which was promptly enacted under the title "The Gold Reserve Act of 1934." This act vested in the United States Government the custody and control of our stocks of gold as a reserve for our paper currency and as a medium of settling international balances. It set up a stabilization fund for the control of foreign exchange in the interests of our people, and certain amendments were added to facilitate the acquisition of silver.

As stated in my message to the Congress, this legislation was recommended as a step in improving our financial and monetary system. Its enactment has laid a foundation on which we are organizing a currency system that will be both sound and adequate. It is a long step forward, but only a step.

As a part of the larger objective, some things have been clear. One is that we should move forward as rapidly as conditions permit in broadening the metallic base of our monetary system and in stabilizing the purchasing and debt-paying power of our money on a more equitable level. Another is that we should not neglect the value of an increased use of silver in improving our monetary system. Since 1929 that has been obvious.

Some measures for making a greater use of silver in the public interest are appropriate for independent action by us. On others international cooperation should be sought.

Of the former class is that of increasing the proportion of silver in the abundant metallic reserves back of our paper currency. This policy was initiated by the proclamation of December 21, 1933, bringing our current domestic production of silver into the Treasury, as well as placing this Nation among the first to carry out the agreement on silver which we sought and secured at the London Conference. We have since acquired other silver in the interest of stabilization of foreign exchange and the development of a broader metallic base for our currency. We seek to remedy a maladjustment of our currency.

In further aid of this policy it would be helpful to have legislation broadening the authority for the further acquisition and monetary use of silver.

I, therefore, recommend legislation at the present session declaring it to be the policy of the United States to increase the amount of silver in our monetary stocks with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of their monetary value in silver and three fourths in gold.

The executive authority should be authorized and directed to make the purchases of silver necessary to attain this ultimate objective.

The authority to purchase present accumulations of silver in this country should be limited to purchases at not in excess of 50 cents per ounce.

The executive authority should be enabled, should circumstances require, to take over present surpluses of silver in this country not required for industrial uses on payment of just compensation, and to regulate imports, exports, and other dealings in monetary silver.

There should be a tax of at least 50 percent on the profits accruing from dealing in silver.

We can proceed with this program of increasing our store of silver for use as a part of the metallic reserves for our paper currency without seriously disturbing adjustments in world trade. However, because of the great world supply of silver and its use in varying forms by the world's population, concerted action by all nations, or at least a large group of nations, is necessary if a permanent measure of value, including both gold and silver, is eventually to be made a world standard. To arrive at that point, we must seek every possibility for world agreement, although it may turn out that this Nation will ultimately have to take such independent action on this phase of the matter as its interests require.

The success of the London Conference in consummating an international agreement on silver, which has now been ratified by all the governments concerned, makes such further agreement worth seeking. The ebb and flow of values in almost all parts of the world have created many points of pressure for readjustments of internal and international standards. At no time since the efforts of this Nation to secure international agreement on silver began in 1878 have conditions been more favorable for making progress along this line.

Accordingly, I have begun to confer with some of our neighbors in regard to the use of both silver and gold, preferably on a coordinated basis, as a standard of monetary value. Such an agreement would constitute an important step forward toward a monetary unit of value more equitable and stable in its purchasing and debt-paying power.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 22, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the message just read to the Senate and the action which the President desires taken on it are the culmination of several years of consideration of the silver question.

After what we may term the "Bryan era" there was such a prejudice in the United States with regard to the use of silver as money that for many years it was impossible to consider the question from a sane monetary standpoint. However, that prejudice has largely been removed. We have had the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the House Committee on Banking and Currency, the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures studying numerous bills which have been introduced on the subject during the past 2 years. Many facts with regard to monetary silver and also with regard to the production, consumption, and movement of silver were learned by Congress and by the general public.

There was a fear, for instance, that, under the Gresham Law, if silver moved into this country too rapidly, gold would move out. With the unlimited coinage of silver by governments where there has been a different ratio established, that has been the effect in the past and might be the effect in the future. That condition does not exist, however, in relation to the purchase of silver, because the history of the purchase of silver from time immemorial has demonstrated that there is a world price for silver when silver is permitted to flow freely. For instance, today the world price of silver is 44 to 45 cents an ounce. The price of silver in the United States, by reason of restrictions against foreign silver and because of special acts in behalf of our own silver, is 64½ cents an ounce, but everywhere else in the world there is a uniform market price for silver.

There was a fear at one time that there were unlimited quantities of silver which might flow into the United States Treasury if an effort were to be made to acquire silver without limit. Of course, the message of the President puts a definite limit on the amount to be purchased, but I am discussing that matter temporarily from the other standpoint.

We have been told only recently, in editorials and otherwise, by distinguished economists that there are no accurate statistics with regard to silver, but that there are accurate statistics with regard to gold. That is an unfortunate mistake. The statistics with regard to the production, consumption, and movement of silver are far more accurate than with regard to gold. Gold was produced more easily throughout the early ages in that it might be removed from gravel in the form of nuggets and dust, and by placer mining in various forms, even with a frying pan. The history of the geology of the metals discloses the fact that nearly all silver is found in hard rock, in 70 percent of the cases being found combined with lead, zinc, copper, or gold.

While it was easy to remove gold from the alluvial gravels in early times, it was not easy to remove silver from the rocks, because until the discovery of powder by the Chinese some 400 years ago, the process of breaking rock was a very slow one. Those who doubt the statistics in this matter need not take alone the report of our Director of the Mint, which is based upon the history of the production of the metals. They may go back to the old German works or the old French works or even to the old Roman works and learn how accurate the statistics are. But I am passing that question for the time being. I say there is a limit now to be applied in this act.

Today the statisticians and economists tell us that there is not to exceed 12,000,000,000 ounces of silver throughout the entire world. Some of them, in computing depreciation and loss, say there is only 9,000,000,000 ounces of silver in the world. We know there is probably 2,500,000,000 ounces of silver in China alone, and it is hidden away in the adobe walls and in the ground. It is their store of wealth. We know that in India there are probably five or six billion ounces, depending on estimates of depletion and loss, largely in the form of jewelry of the women, because the women cannot inherit in that country, and that is the way they keep their wealth. So this fear has been largely dissipated.

There were those in this body and in the other House of Congress who, believing that there was no danger from the free and unlimited coinage of silver, because they did not believe that silver would move to this country, have advocated it. They have not advocated it on the narrow ground that it would benefit the mines of their State, and yet they have been charged with doing so. If that were true, why should we find 230 or 240 Members of the House advocating the remonetization of silver in some form, inevitably raising its price, if it depended solely upon the selfish purpose of the mine owners? There are probably only 25 or 30 Representatives and probably 10 or 12 Senators from the section of the country which produces silver, and yet we find this tremendous support of the remonetization of silver in the Senate and in the House. Yet in the face of the fact that able economists will stick to their dictum that there are no accurate statistics with regard to silver, and there may be an unlimited quantity, in the face of their continued assertion that silver will come out of India and will come out of China in spite of the history of the past, it becomes necessary, of course, as it is necessary in every legislative matter, that there be a rapprochement, a meeting of minds. Every step is an advantage.

What do we find in this message? We find that the principle underlying the request in the message is the readjustment of our maladjusted currency in this country. It is true that the message calls attention to the fact that for a further advance in the remonetization of silver and its stabilization throughout the world at some fixed price, such as that of $1.29, as it is in our country, or at 16 to 1, the President believes international action would be required. I may say that I do not agree with that conclusion. Nevertheless, everyone is entitled to his own opinion on the subject.

Now, let us see. This is not new. I desire to give some figures to show that there is a maladjustment of our currency.

Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], our leader, I am now about to introduce a bill which is an administration bill. It is a bill which was prepared by the Treasury Department under the instructions and supervision of the President of the United States. It is intended to carry out the message he has just sent to the Senate.

Let me say that while this is the President's bill, I do not feel that the President would desire to claim the entire credit for it. The fact is well known to this body and to the people of the country that conferences have been proceeding here among groups in the Senate, and between those groups and the President, in several meetings, on and off, for 5 or 6 weeks. I may say that the foundation for this message and for this proposed legislation might be called the Dies bill, which came over from the House, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, reported out to this body, and is now on the calendar. That bill provided that foreign importers of our agricultural products might pay for those products in foreign silver at a value from 10 to 25 percent above the world market price.

When that bill went to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, an amendment was offered to it, I think, by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], which carried provisions very similar to those which were in the Wheeler silver purchase bill which was introduced and acted upon in this body some time ago. In other words, it provided for the purchase of 50,000,000 ounces of silver a month until the price of silver should go above $1.29 an ounce, or until the 1926 index level should be reached. There was added to that bill in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a provision such as I have mentioned for the purchase of silver.

The first conference that we had was participated in by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and myself. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] called the group together for the purpose of discussing among themselves in the first place the Dies bill, and any proper changes that might be made in it on the floor of the Senate. The Senator from Utah arranged, 5 or 6 weeks ago, the conference with the President, at which the Senators whose names I have read were present. The discussion at that conference naturally revolved around the pending legislation—that is, the Dies bill as amended, which is now on the calendar.

I think I violate no confidence when I say that the President was instantly opposed to the Dies bill as it came from the House. He felt that it would not accomplish the purpose which the agriculturists of the country thought it would accomplish. He felt that there would be retaliation which would offset any benefit that might be hoped to be obtained from it. I think he was firm and fixed in that view.

As to the other provisions, with regard to the purchase of 50,000,000 ounces of silver a month, the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Oliphant, the general counsel to the Secretary, who was of splendid assistance in this matter, urged that if the Government were required to purchase 50,000,000 ounces of silver a month, it would be at the mercy of sellers of silver throughout the world; that the very knowledge that the Government had no discretion, but must bid and bid and bid for silver until it received 50,000,000 ounces every month, would undoubtedly crowd the price of silver up to the limit of $1.29 an ounce, which is the monetary value at which it circulates as specie and in the form of silver certificates in this country, and one of the chief purposes of readjusting our maladjusted currency would be defeated by that very provision.

In this connection, Mr. President, let me read some figures. I take these figures from a speech which I delivered on September 21, 1933, and the figures were actually compiled from the Treasury Department's records.

There has been a constant fear expressed by those who are opposed to the expansion of silver currency of the United States that our currency would be overbalanced with silver. The statistics with regard to our total stock of money in the United States and the percentage thereof in silver in 1900 and on July 31, 1933, respectively, are as follows:

Now, note the change:

In 1900 the total money was $2,336,220,000; silver money, $648,995,000; or 27 percent of our entire currency was silver currency.

On July 31, 1933, the total money was $10,014,268,674; silver money, $838,662,359, or 8 percent. At the present time the silver money is about 12 percent of the total.

Going on with that statement, the total stock of silver as of July 31, 1933, was $838,662,359. Thus there could be added to the silver stock of July 31, 1933, before its percentage of the total stock of money in the United States would equal the percentage of 1900, $1,935,290,000 worth of silver.

Those figures were given by me in a statement made on the 17th day of November 1933 to the Committee for the Nation, of which at that time the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] was acting as chairman. I think the same figures were given there.

I may say that that is the percentage of total currency. If we go back to 1900 to find what the percentage of silver coin and silver certificates issued against the coins in the Treasury was in ratio to the gold of the United States, we find that the percentage of silver was nearer 50 percent.

As I have said, the object is to secure the readjustment of a maladjusted currency. The cause of the maladjustment of the currency is easy to explain. In 1873 the Government ceased to coin standard silver dollars, but coined only halves, quarters, and dimes. But it continued the accumulation of gold, however, and the issuance of additional forms of gold currency in this country, and the disparity between gold and silver grew.

This idea of a readjustment of our currency is not new. I call attention, for instance, to the informal conferences held in Washington among the various governments at the invitation of the President of the United States in preparation for silver agreements at London, which considered a resolution, which was submitted to every government represented here, before the delegates went to London, providing that all governments should carry in their treasuries or in their central banks at least 20 percent of their metallic reserves in silver and could carry 25 percent in silver. There were those of us here who urged that they should carry a larger proportion than 25 percent in silver. Yet the President had recommended to the foreign governments at London that they carry 25 percent in silver in their reserves. So he has placed that amount in the bill.

I now introduce the bill, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the bill read?

Mr. PITTMAN. I believe it will be sufficient to have it published in the RECORD. That will serve the same purpose as having it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3658) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the short title of this act shall be the "Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States, authorized by law, or with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest: Provided, That no purchases of silver shall be made hereunder (a) at a price in excess of the monetary value thereof or (b) whenever and so long as the monetary value of the stocks of silver is equal to or greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver: And provided further, That no purchases of silver situated in the continental United States on May 1, 1934, shall be made hereunder at a price in excess of 50 cents a fine ounce.

SEC. 4. Whenever and so long as the market price of silver exceeds its monetary value or the monetary value of the stocks of silver is greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver, the Secretary of the Treasury may, with the approval of the President and subject to the provisions of section 5, sell any silver acquired under the authority of this act, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3. There shall be maintained in the Treasury as security for all silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued and at the time outstanding an amount of silver in bullion and standard silver dollars of a monetary value equal to the face amount of such silver certificates. All silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, and shall be redeemable on demand at the Treasury of the United States in standard silver dollars; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to coin standard silver dollars for such redemption.

SEC. 6. Whenever in his judgment such action is necessary to effectuate the policy of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, with the approval of the President, to investigate, regulate, or prohibit, by means of licenses or otherwise, the acquisition, importation, exportation, or transportation of silver and of contracts and other arrangements made with respect thereto; and to require the filing of reports deemed by him reasonably necessary in connection therewith. Whoever willfully violates the provisions of any license, order, rule, or regulation issued pursuant to the authorization contained in this section, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, may be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both; and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation may be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both.

SEC. 7. Whenever in the judgment of the President such action is necessary to regulate the value of the money of the United States, he may by Executive order require the delivery to the United States mints of any or all silver by whomever owned or possessed. The silver so delivered shall be coined into standard silver dollars or otherwise added to the monetary stocks of the United States as the President may determine; and there shall be returned therefor in standard silver dollars, or any other coin or currency of the United States, the monetary value of the silver so delivered less such deductions for seigniorage, brassage, coinage, and other mint charges as the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President shall have determined: Provided, That, in no case, shall the value of the amount returned therefor be less than the fair value at the time of such order of the silver required to be delivered as such value is determined by the market price over a reasonable period terminating at the time of such order. The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay all necessary costs of the transportation of such silver and standard silver dollars, coin, or currency, including the cost of insurance, protection, and such other incidental costs as may be reasonably necessary. Any silver withheld in violation of any Executive order issued under this section or of any regulations issued pursuant thereto shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law; and in addition any person failing to comply with the provisions of any such Executive order or regulation shall be subject to a penalty equal to twice the monetary value of the silver in respect of which such failure occurred.

SEC. 8. Schedule A of title VIII of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended (relating to stamp taxes), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"10. Silver, etc., sales and transfers: On all transfers of any interest in silver bullion, if the price for which such interest is or is to be transferred exceeds the total of the cost thereof and allowed expenses, 50 percent of the amount of such excess. On every such transfer there shall be made and delivered by the transferor to the transferee a memorandum to which there shall be affixed lawful stamps in value equal to the tax thereon. Every such memorandum shall show the date thereof, the names and addresses of the transferor and transferee, the interest in silver bullion to which it refers, the price for which such interest is or is to be transferred, and the cost thereof and the allowed expenses. Any person liable for payment of tax under this subdivision (or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for any such person) who is a party to any such transfer, or who in pursuance of any such transfer delivers any silver bullion or interest therein, without a memorandum stating truly and completely the information herein required, or who delivers any such memorandum without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both. Stamps affixed under this subdivision shall be canceled (in lieu of the manner provided in sec. 804) by such officers and in such manner as regulations under this subdivision shall prescribe. Such officers shall cancel such stamps only if it appears that the proper tax is being paid, and when stamps with respect to any transfer are so canceled, the transferor and not the transferee shall be liable for any additional tax found due or penalty with respect to such transfer. The provisions of this subdivision shall extend to all transfers in the United States of any interest in silver bullion, and to all such transfers outside the United States if either party thereto is a resident of the United States or is a citizen of the United States who has been a resident thereof within 3 months before the date of the transfer or if such silver bullion or interest therein is situated in the United States; and shall extend to transfers to the United States Government (the tax in such cases to be payable by the transferor), but shall not extend to transfers of silver bullion by deposit or delivery at a United States mint under proclamation by the President or in compliance with any Executive order issued pursuant to section 7 of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. The tax under this subdivision on transfers enumerated in subdivision 4 shall be in addition to the tax under such subdivision. This subdivision shall apply (1) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion after the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and (2) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion on or after May 15, 1934, and prior to the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, except that in such cases it shall be paid by the transferor in such manner and at such time as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulations prescribe, and the requirement of a memorandum of such transfer shall not apply.

"As used in this subdivision—

"The term 'cost' means the cost of the interest in silver bullion to the transferor, except that (a) in case of silver bullion produced from materials containing silver which has not previously entered into industrial, commercial, or monetary use, the cost to a transferor who is the producer shall be deemed to be the market price at the time of production determined in accordance with regulations issued hereunder; (b) in the case of an interest in silver bullion acquired by the transferor otherwise than for valuable consideration, the cost shall be deemed to be the cost thereof to the last previous transferor by whom it was acquired for a valuable consideration; and (c) in the case of any interest in silver bullion acquired by the transferor (after Apr. 15, 1934, and before the tax under this subdivision takes effect) in a wash sale, the cost shall be deemed to be the cost to him of the interest transferred by him in such wash sale, but with proper adjustment, in accordance with regulations under this subdivision, when such interests are in silver bullion for delivery at different times.

"The term 'transfer' means a sale, agreement of sale, agreement to sell, memorandum of sale or delivery of, or transfer, whether made by assignment in blank or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or any other evidence of transfer or sale, or means to make a transfer as so defined.

"The term 'interest in silver bullion' means any title or claim to or interest in any silver bullion or contract therefor.

"The term 'allowed expenses' means usual and necessary expenses actually incurred in holding, refining, or transporting the interest in silver bullion as to which an interest is transferred (including storage, insurance, and transportation charges, but not including interest, taxes, or charges in the nature of overhead), determined in accordance with regulations issued hereunder.

"The term 'memorandum' means a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of a transfer.

"The term 'wash sale' means a transaction involving the transfer of an interest in silver bullion and, within 30 days before or after such transfer, the acquisition by the same person of an interest in silver bullion. Only so much of the interest so acquired as does not exceed the interest so transferred, and only so much of the interest so transferred as does not exceed the interest so acquired, shall be deemed to be included in the wash sale.

"The term 'silver bullion' means silver which has been melted, smelted, or refined and is in such state or condition that its value depends primarily upon the silver content and not upon its form."

SEC. 9. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, with the approval of the President, such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary or proper to carry out the purposes of this act or of any order issued hereunder.

SEC. 10. As used in this act:

The term "person" means an individual, partnership, association, or corporation;

The term "the continental United States" means the States of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territory of Alaska;

The term "monetary value" means a value calculated on the basis of $1 for an amount of silver or gold equal to the amount at the time contained in the standard silver dollar and the gold dollar, respectively;

The term "stocks of silver" means the total amount of silver at the time owned by the United States (whether or not held as security for outstanding currency of the United States) and of silver contained in coins of the United States at the time outstanding;

The term "stocks of gold" means the total amount of gold at the time owned by the United States, whether or not held as a reserve or as security for any outstanding currency of the United States; and

The term "silver bullion" means silver which has been melted, smelted, or refined and is in such state or condition that its value depends primarily upon the silver content and not upon its form.

SEC. 11. In addition to any sums appropriated by section 3, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, which shall be available for expenditure, under the direction of the President and in his discretion, for any purpose in connection with the carrying out of this act; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated annually such additional sums as may be necessary for such purposes.

SEC. 12. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 13. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, but the authority conferred in this act upon the President and the Secretary of the Treasury is declared to be supplemental to the authority heretofore conferred.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, having in view the fundamental principle of the readjustment of our currency, finding that it was necessary, finding that we would bring the currency back nearly to normal, there could be no uneasiness with regard to those who fear inflation.

I think I should say in all frankness that the group of Senators who participated equally in all of these conferences with the President were successful, I may say, in convincing him that there were certain fundamental principles which must be embodied in the legislation or the legislation would not only be futile but would be damaging to the very cause of the remonetization of silver.

In the very nature of things, when the Secretary of the Treasury and his expert advisers and his attorneys started to draft a measure, they desired that there be no mandatory features whatever in the measure. I can understand their feeling. They know little about silver. They suspect much with regard to silver. They are misadvised by distinguished and learned professors who know less about silver.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am sorry; I cannot yield.

In the nature of things, until they have 25 percent of the metallic reserves in silver, they desire that the provision in regard to the purchasing of silver be purely permissive, that it be provided that they might take the action if they saw fit.

They have that permissive power now, under existing law. There were none of this group favorable to that permissive principle. We insisted that if the principle were correct—that is, that we should maintain at least 25 percent of our metallic reserves in silver—and if the President favored that, and if he intended to carry it out in the spirit in which it was intended, then there was nothing improper, in using the ordinary terms we use in bills, in saying that we not only authorized but we authorized and directed, the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver until the desired end was accomplished.

There had to be limitations, of course. The first limitation was that when the monetary value of silver went over $1.29 an ounce, which is the measure at which the silver certificates are circulated, and all silver dollars are circulated, then it went above the parity price, and it would probably pay to melt up our coin and sell it as bullion.

There was a power already in the President of the United States to stop that. That power had been used before. There is a general parity act, which authorizes the President to sell even standard silver dollars in order to prevent the price from going above the parity price. The power was used in 1920 to beat the war price down from $1.38 an ounce to below a dollar. But in order that there might be no misunderstanding, so that it would be definite, two limitations were placed upon the purchases. One of them was that when the price, if it should do so, went above $1.29 an ounce, not only should the Treasury cease to purchase, but that it should have the right to sell silver in order to prevent it from going higher.

There was another limitation, that when the Secretary of the Treasury had acquired a sufficient amount of silver to amount to 25 percent of our metallic monetary reserves, then he should cease to purchase.

There was a permissive feature, and it was as to that that this group finally compromised with the President. The President yielded with regard to the mandatory provision about purchasing silver until he got 25 percent of the reserves, and we yielded on the point that he should not be required to purchase 50,000,000 ounces a month, or any other particular amount. We yielded and allowed him his discretion in good faith to buy silver at such times and upon such terms and conditions as he might consider in the interest of the Government of the United States, but that he should in good faith ultimately acquire sufficient silver to equal 25 percent of our reserves.

There was another difference between this group and the Treasury Department, and that difference was simply this: There was no provision in the Treasury bill for the utilization of the silver they bought. Of course, it is apparent that to buy in the course of time 1,700,000,000 ounces of silver, and store it in the vaults of the Treasury, and never use it, would not result in eliminating the maladjustment of our silver currency. It might raise the price and have its effect in that way on our export and import trade. The raising of the price would undoubtedly answer Japan, and it is the only answer we have to them. Raise the price of the exchange value of the silver of the world and Japanese costs rise that much. On the other hand, the purchasing power of those people in our own country will be greater. The raising of the price of silver, as far as foreign countries are concerned, has exactly the same relative effect as the depreciation of our currency or the depreciation of any other currency. Therefore, there must be a provision in the act that the silver, when acquired, shall be utilized for the purpose of bringing our currency up to a normal condition.

We of the group here, in preparing the act as we saw it, provided that the silver should be bought with silver certificates. But we were answered by the experts of the Treasury Department, "We may prefer to buy it with gold, or with Federal Reserve bank notes, or with credit, or with any other form of money." We said, "Very well; that is true. Then if you do not see fit to buy with silver certificates, issue silver certificates against the bullion you have in the Treasury to the amount of one dollar's worth of silver certificates for every dollar you spend in buying it, and let those silver certificates be based on the same kind of silver in their issue as all our silver certificates are. In other words, that there be a dollar issue of silver certificates or standard silver dollars against every 371¼ grains of silver, which is the present measure. Or if, under the amendment I offered to the gold act, the President sees fit to reduce the silver content of the silver dollar from 371 grains to one half that, then one silver dollar certificate against whatever the monetary unit of the standard silver dollar is.

When that matter was explained to the President of the United States he concurred absolutely with the members of this voluntary committee who presented the matter to him. So we have before us the bill I have presented, which would accomplish three or four things. The main thing it would result in would be requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver until he had acquired a sufficient amount of silver to constitute 25 percent of our monetary reserve.

It requires him either to purchase that with silver certificates on the basis of the issue of our existing silver certificates, or he may change the content of the dollar upon that basis, and to circulate those silver certificates in the ordinary course of business. Those are the fundamental principles of this bill.

The bill right at the start makes this declaration:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

That is the heart of the bill. That is the chief purpose of the bill. That is carried out by the methods I have indicated.

There are other permissive features of this bill. There is a provision in the bill which authorizes the President of the United States to nationalize silver. In other words, it permits him to do with regard to silver what he has done with regard to gold; that is, he may commandeer the silver in this country by paying for it its value. There is a detailed method of arriving at that. It is very carefully worked out, as was done with regard to gold, so as to come within the Constitution, and to make sure that no one is deprived of silver bullion without due process of law.

There is still another provision in this bill which has to do with a tax. That tax feature provides that any silver sold after this bill goes into force and effect shall carry stamps which measure one half of the profit between what the seller paid for it and what he got for it. That tax is effective on sales made after the bill passes and becomes law.

However, the framers of the bill desired to take care of sales that might be made while this bill was being discussed and enacted, so they said that from the 15th day of May of this year any sales which were made should not carry with them the use of stamps, because the sales would probably be made before this bill was passed, but those sales should be subject to an excess-profits tax of 50 percent on the profits made on the sales and accounted for.

The nationalization is permissive. Whether or not the President will see fit to put it into effect will have to be determined. I do not think he has his mind made up.

As to the tax, that is fixed. I wish to say that the tax does not apply to silver which is acquired in stocks for manufacture, because when a manufacturer buys silver to use for manufacturing purposes he does not sell that silver, but uses it, and there is no profit actually on the purchase of the silver unless it possibly can be reflected in the profits of his manufacturing industry, and such profits, of course, are taken care of by the income tax. It does not apply, and it is expressly provided in the bill that it shall not apply, to silver mined in the United States, under the proclamation of the President. So with the value of 64½ cents an ounce it is expressly provided the tax shall not apply to such silver. It has no tax to pay, because it is not a profit transaction. It is simply a transaction of surrendering to the Government one's silver and having it coined on the seigniorage basis, or giving to the Government half of the silver for the purpose of having the other half coined into silver dollars.

I am calling this to the attention of the Senate so that there may be no misunderstanding and no fear with regard to this entire proposition.

It is urged, of course, and has been urged time and again that nothing can be done with regard to silver except by international agreement. Is it possible that anyone would contend that each government does not have the authority to regulate its own currency? Is it possible that we may not decide the limit to which we will permit the issue of Federal Reserve bank notes, the limit of national bank notes, the limit of gold notes, the limit of silver certificates?

Since the very beginning of the Government it has been the function of Congress not only to coin and issue money but to regulate money, and we do regulate money. We have attempted to regulate, through the Federal Reserve Board, the flow of money, and the expansion of credit, through its power of raising the rediscount rate.

Now, when we find ourselves with a maladjusted currency, the different forms rapidly drifting farther and farther apart, to say that it requires international action seems to me almost absurd.

Of course if one is driving to the ultimate end of having all governments give exactly the same measure to their currency that we and other governments give, then there is just as much necessity for international agreement with regard to silver as there is with regard to gold. There is not any doubt whatever that ultimately there will be an agreement among the great powers as to how many grains of gold the pound sterling will buy, and how many grains of gold the dollar will buy, and when that is once adjusted, then the relative exchange value of the pound sterling and the dollar is adjusted. All know that. All are driving to that end.

At the London Conference I think every great economist there agreed that never again could we have the form of the gold standard that we have had in the past. They all agreed that gold would have to be utilized in a closed circuit between treasuries and central banks for the sole purpose of settling international balances; that there was no more than enough gold for that purpose, if there was enough for that; and that the transfer of gold should be handled as banks in great cities handle their settlements through the clearing house.

But when that is done, how about silver money? There is silver money in the world. We have $800,000,000 worth of silver money in this country. As I have said, at one time we had 50 percent of our metallic money in silver. Even today it represents 12 percent of all our currency. Great Britain has silver money. France has silver money. Italy has silver money. It is all a part of their monetary systems. Many think that perhaps China and India are the only countries which have silver money. Today in South America the only hard money that is ever seen is silver money. In Mexico the only hard money that is ever seen is silver money. Ninety percent of their transactions are carried on with silver money. Silver is still and always has been used as money throughout the world.

We are not creating anything new. It is true, sir, that for the first time since 1873 silver has a different status. It has been declared full legal tender and by that act was remonetized.

When H.R. 3835—Public, No. 10, Seventy-third Congress—an act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, and so forth, was under consideration, I offered this amendment to it:

> Such notes and all other coins and currencies heretofore or hereafter coined or issued by or under authority of the United States shall be legal tender for all debts public and private.

That, sir, has been the law of the United States since May 12, 1933.

I contend, therefore, and have contended before the experts of the Treasury Department and our own group, that that very provision of law in itself makes silver primary money. When I say "primary money" I mean money that does not depend for its purchasing power upon any other money or any other thing. It has the same intrinsic value, if one wishes to go back to intrinsic value, that gold has—in different proportions. The standard silver dollar has a higher percentage in intrinsic value by measuring the value of the silver content than any of our currency except gold coins. The Federal Reserve bank note only had 40 percent behind it. When silver has reached the price of 64½ cents an ounce, we will have 50 percent intrinsic value behind every standard silver dollar. When it reaches $1.29, we will have 100 percent, because a silver certificate will be issued only against a 100-percent dollar in the Treasury. Therefore, we have reached a point where our Government has taken a broad step, whose soundness cannot be questioned by any financier or economist in this country. We are going back to the normal adjustment of our currency as of 1900; yes, slightly below what it was at that time, because in 1900 27 percent of our currency was silver, whereas this bill only provides that 25 percent shall be silver. In 1873 and prior thereto the percentage of silver in our currency was much greater, for, taking the metallic base as of 1900, as I say, it was practically 50 percent. Today, according to the metallic base, it is probably 12 percent. So, Mr. President, we are simply readjusting our currency back to normal, and there is no necessity whatever of calling on foreign countries to take action.

This matter with regard to silver was submitted to the monetary section of the London conference. Of that section I happened to be chairman. When the proposition of a silver reserve was submitted to them there was no contention against carrying this reserve. The contention, however, was made by the delegates of 13 governments that they already carried 30-percent reserve in silver, and they would not consent to lower that percentage. There was also a great dispute as to what should be the limit of the value of silver in measuring such reserves. We withdrew that resolution, not because all the governments probably, except one, did not favor carrying such silver reserves, but because they wanted to carry more in many instances than the resolution provided. So that resolution was withdrawn.

Now when we shall carry out this proposed act, we will be doing what our Government proposed to 66 other governments of the world; we will be doing that with regard to our own currency which we have a right to do, and which it is our duty to do; and we will be taking the initiative and setting an example to the other nations of the world in the manner in which we advised them to proceed.

Inflation. That is a condition which many in this country fear; but I think we have deflated our money and credits until the debtor today has to pay twice as much in products and labor as he had to pay when he borrowed the money. I do not want to get into that argument, for it is an endless one; but I wish to say that the total amount of silver required to bring it up to the desired percentage will not be in excess of 1,700,000,000 ounces. Upon such an amount there might be based over $2,000,000,000 of silver certificates issued in currency. That, however, will not be a sudden transaction. Unfortunately, it might be impossible at this time to buy 300,000,000 ounces of silver without reaching the point in price, $1.29 an ounce, at which we could not buy any more. I think that is the consensus of opinion of statisticians and experts who have studied the question. The process of acquiring silver, of course, has to be a slow one.

The total world production of silver last year was only 160,000,000 ounces, and 20 percent of that was used in the arts. India and China from time immemorial have taken two thirds of the production of silver in the world. We cannot look to get 1,700,000,000 ounces of silver from the current annual production of the world. There is no hope of any sudden production of silver, no matter what the price may be, because throughout the entire world 70 percent of the silver produced is as a byproduct of lead, zinc, and copper; when there is no market for lead, zinc, and copper those commodities are not produced, and when they are not produced silver is not produced. In 1923 we produced 67,000,000 ounces of silver in this country, which was our greatest production of that metal, and that was on account of the enormous production of copper, lead, and zinc, principally lead. Last year our production of silver was less than 24,000,000 ounces, because of the low production of copper, lead, and zinc.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As I understand the theory of the Senator's proposal, while the objective is mandatory, to wit, 75–25, the approach to that objective is entirely in the discretion of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. Is that correct?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What would the Senator's interpretation be respecting the duty of the President and the Secretary in the use of this discretionary power? In other words, would it be the Senator's interpretation that the President would be under obligation to buy all the silver that was offered and was available until such time as it reached a price of $1.29 an ounce, or would there be a discretion in him not to go into the silver market at all if he should not want to do so?

Mr. PITTMAN. The latter is absolutely correct, by reason of the fact that it is far more important to our Government to acquire the silver and utilize it than it is to run the price up to $1.29 an ounce; and, having the higher purpose in mind, the President would naturally realize that taking all the silver offered to him would have the effect of suddenly bringing the price of silver up to the limit at which he could not buy and destroy the chief purpose of the proposed act.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So that the matter of purchase and the speed of purchase is entirely and exclusively discretionary?

Mr. PITTMAN. Entirely so, and that discretion, of course, the President would not surrender, because there are other reasons, I may say, for it. It is almost as disastrous for a foreign country that uses silver, such as China and India, and even Mexico very suddenly to increase the exchange value of its money as it is suddenly to have it depressed, because frequently contracts are based in those countries on 6 months' time, and if there shall be a sudden change in the exchange value of their silver money—and a change is always with the price of silver either up or downward—someone is going to lose. These is no desire on the part of our Government to disrupt the monetary systems of other countries; in fact, we regret and deplore that other governments have taken advantage of their legal rights so suddenly to depreciate the value of their currencies as to disrupt our own commercial transactions in this country, and we are all aware that that has happened.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, would it be the Senator's idea, if the extension of this process should cause a sharp increase in silver values, that the purchase program probably would stop at that point?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not any doubt that the President would refrain from buying while such conditions were threatened.

Mr. VANDENBERG. How long does the Senator think it would take over a term of years to reach the 75–25-percent objective which is set up in the bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. I should say that would depend very largely upon the policy and desire of our Government and the redistribution of gold among the various governments of the world. It is perfectly evident that France and the United States cannot continue to hold over half the gold of the world and still have gold as the standard of 66 countries in the world. There is the problem of gold redistribution, which, of course, is in the mind of everyone. Exactly when that will be worked out, so that it will be safe to part with the gold, and it will be known that there will be no danger of loss, the redistribution of gold must take place and in connection with that redistribution there must then be more or less a redistribution of silver. In that case the redistribution would be brought about in an orderly way, and very much sooner than it would if carried on simply by a process of sudden bidding. It is totally impossible for us now, at least, for me, to visualize ahead what may happen to both gold and silver in the next few years, but the purpose or intent of the President is clearly in mind, and I think no one whatever doubts it.

I think that this bill is an excellent one; I think it is a magnificent compromise; and I think that each Senator of the group has had as much to do with it as any other Senator has had. I think that the President of the United States has been in sympathy with us all the time, even if some of his experts were not in sympathy with us; and I feel that we have won a great victory in getting the President of the United States to concur with us so far as he has concurred with us, although I know he had the antagonism of nearly every one of the Treasury Department economists.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I understand the able Senator from Nevada, he does not dissent from the constructive recommendations of the President, but is rather in strict agreement with the suggestion that the metallic base of our credit structure should be broadened by the much wider use of silver for monetary purposes, and that we should proceed by adopting an independent national policy in certain important respects and by seeking international agreements in other vital respects.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly the thing for which we all look. In other words, there is no doubt that practically every member of the voluntary group which was called together is absolutely convinced that the monetary systems of the world which existed prior to 1800 were the soundest systems that ever existed—sounder than any which have existed since. Those systems worked through the ages when money was not used for the purpose of taking away the commerce of one government and another government. The members of this group, who have studied the question for years and years, are not exceptionally expert with regard to financial transactions, but the history of the use of silver as money from the earliest dawn of time down to the present, the history of its production, of its consumption, of its movement, of its present whereabouts, is fairly accurately known to all of them.

The question of whether or not we shall have two standards of measure, or whether we shall have one standard of measure, and whether all other standards of measure shall conform to the one standard of measure is not so material and is not so important as the fact that there is nothing so safe and nothing that so inspires confidence as the precious metals themselves. Governments may fail and disappear, printing presses may run off paper money by the ream which becomes valueless, but every man who has a chunk of silver or a chunk of gold knows it is a precious metal, not only in his own country but in every country throughout the world, and that with that chunk of precious metal he can buy food and clothing.

Therefore, those who clung to the gold standard clung to it for exactly the same reasons that apply to silver. It is because those articles are both precious metals. Since the very beginning of time there was never over a billion ounces of gold produced. Every effort of science and every effort of mechanics has been unable to stimulate much the production of gold or of silver. Having the knowledge that it is a precious metal, that it is good everywhere, people have confidence in it. Not only that, but its production throughout the ages has been uniform. It is found everywhere in the world, though in no great quantities. Not only is the production of each of these metals uniformly about 3 or 4 percent per annum but the relative production of each metal is approximately the same and bears to each other a remarkably uniform character.

So the gold-standard people said "this is money" for the reasons I have described. Not only is it money but if we limit the issue of paper money by the amount of gold we have and if we limit it within the multiple that history tells us is safe and do not go beyond it, then our paper money is safe. So it is with silver. If we limit the issue of paper within the reasonable rate that is indicated by the history of silver, then there is no danger from the paper money based upon silver. But there is danger from paper money in every form, as there was in the case of the mark, and as there has been in the case of the greenback and everything else in history, that is not limited by the amount of gold and silver as a base which has a real intrinsic value everywhere in the world.

Of course, as I said, we of this group think that the soundest money in the world was the gold and silver money of the ages down to 1800. We know that never has either one of those moneys been discredited except by law, artificial laws of the various countries, inaugurated for the purpose of giving one country advantage over another, inaugurated for the purpose of one country stealing the trade of another, inaugurated for the same purposes involved in the depreciation in the currencies of Europe in which they were engaged for the purpose of taking our trade and the trade of other countries.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I think this is, I may say, the third great step forward. The first great forward step was taken when 66 governments at London unanimously—and it had to be unanimous under the rules of the League of Nations—adopted three principles: That they would not permit the melting up or debasement of their silver coins, that they would replace lower-valued currency with silver, and that they would refrain from enacting any legislation which could substantially depreciate the price of silver in the world market.

By those three solemn agreements they have ended forever all the acts which have been destructive of silver throughout the world and of the monetary systems of the various countries of the world. When they persuaded India and China and Spain to limit the sale of their silver and provided that each and every government of producing countries should take the same amount out of their mines for their treasuries for a period of 4 years, after which there should be nothing but mine production, they made silver safe. Then the President issued a proclamation opening the mints of this country to the coinage of silver, which was the second great move. It is the first free coinage of silver we have had since 1873. It is true the President took half of that silver bullion as seigniorage, out of which our Government will me a tremendous profit, but by that very act it gave 64½ cents to the producer, and raised the value of our silver 59 percent above the world price of silver.

Now, by this third step, in restoring our silver metallic reserve, the President is tending to absorb the surplus silver of the world already accumulated by the destruction of its monetary use by many governments, and is encouraging other governments to do the same thing.

Silver will slowly but steadily throughout the world seek its natural level based on supply and demand, and when it does then it will be a simple matter for great governments like Great Britain, the United States, Italy, France, Germany, Switzerland, Mexico, Canada, and the South American countries, to come together so they may safely open their mints to the coinage of silver from every place on earth.

Mr. PITTMAN subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to amend the bill I introduced this morning relating to the silver question, and which is on the table.

The first amendment is to come on page 1 of the bill as submitted, line 6 in section 3, after the words "public interest" and before the comma, to insert the words "until the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States shall equal one fourth of the monetary value of the stocks as set forth in section 2."

I will state the object of the amendment. Section 2 provides:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States shall be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

There is no question that it was the intention of the President that the Treasury should be authorized to continue buying until there had been obtained one fourth of such stock. In fact, the President stated very frankly to the group that met with him that he would carry that intention out in the spirit in which it was suggested. However, it has been suggested that possibly that might be subject to misinterpretation. We do not desire any such possibility, and therefore I have suggested this amendment.

Another amendment is to strike out section 8 and section 11. Section 8 is the revenue provision; section 11 is the appropriation provision.

I realized at the time I introduced the bill that revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives. It has sometimes been held, however, that where a revenue provision is purely incidental to other legislation, such a provision might originate in the Senate. To save any trouble in regard to that matter, however, I am now perfecting my bill by striking out section 8, which is the revenue provision, and also by striking out section 11, which is the appropriation provision.

I wish to say that this bill, with the exception of a date in the revenue provision, which I am striking out, is in the exact language in which it was read to the group of us by the President at the White House at the last meeting we had. The only doubt that has arisen that I know of is as to the construction of the language, which was suggested to me by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and others, which is now corrected.

I am authorized, on behalf of the President, to whom I talked over the telephone, to make these changes, and also to state that, at the time the question was raised by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], that the bill did not make silver primary money; the President expressed his ignorance of what the words "primary money" meant, and that he is willing to give to silver the same position in our monetary reserve system as is given gold; and that is done in section 2. There is no provision for the redemption of silver by gold at the present time, and the other provision, making silver coins and silver certificates full legal tender for both private debts and public dues, in the act itself, in addition to other acts, seems to place silver on exactly the same footing with gold.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that the amendments which he has made seem to be very good amendments. By striking out section 8, the Senator makes possible an American market for silver, instead of having the price fixed in the London market. I think the two amendments the Senator has suggested, so far as I see now, effect a great difference in the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I may say that personally I have always been in favor of the American market, but we are all trying to get together, and it is not mandatory.

I wish to add that it is my purpose, whenever the so-called "Dies bill", which is on the calendar, shall be considered, to move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to substitute my bill as now perfected.

The bill introduced by Mr. PITTMAN, as modified, was ordered to be printed, to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3658

A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the short title of this act shall be the "Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States, authorized by law, or with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest until the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States shall equal one fourth of the monetary value of such stocks as set forth in section 2: Provided, That no purchases of silver shall be made hereunder (a) at a price in excess of the monetary value thereof, or (b) whenever and so long as the monetary value of the stocks of silver is equal to or greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver: And provided further, That no purchases of silver situated in the continental United States on May 1, 1934, shall be made hereunder at a price in excess of 50 cents a fine ounce.

SEC. 4. Whenever and so long as the market price of silver exceeds its monetary value or the monetary value of the stocks of silver is greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver, the Secretary of the Treasury may, with the approval of the President and subject to the provisions of section 5, sell any silver acquired under the authority of this act, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3. There shall be maintained in the Treasury as security for all silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued and at the time outstanding an amount of silver in bullion and standard silver dollars of a monetary value equal to the face amount of such silver certificates. All silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, and shall be redeemable on demand at the Treasury of the United States in standard silver dollars; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to coin standard silver dollars for such redemption.

SEC. 6. Whenever in his judgment such action is necessary to effectuate the policy of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, with the approval of the President, to investigate, regulate, or prohibit, by means of licenses or otherwise, the acquisition, importation, exportation, or transportation of silver and of contracts and other arrangements made with respect thereto; and to require the filing of reports deemed by him reasonably necessary in connection therewith. Whoever wilfully violates the provisions of any license, order, rule, or regulation issued pursuant to the authorization contained in this section shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, may be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both; and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation may be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both.

SEC. 7. Whenever in the judgment of the President such action is necessary to regulate the value of the money of the United States, he may, by Executive order, require the delivery to the United States mints of any or all silver by whomever owned or possessed. The silver so delivered shall be coined into standard silver dollars or otherwise added to the monetary stocks of the United States as the President may determine; and there shall be returned therefor in standard silver dollars, or any other coin or currency of the United States, the monetary value of the silver so delivered less such deductions for seigniorage, brassage, coinage, and other mint charges as the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President shall have determined: Provided, That, in no case, shall the value of the amount returned therefor be less than the fair value at the time of such order of the silver required to be delivered as such value is determined by the market price over a reasonable period terminating at the time of such order. The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay all necessary costs of the transportation of such silver and standard silver dollars, coin or currency, including the cost of insurance, protection, and such other incidental costs as may be reasonably necessary. Any silver withheld in violation of any Executive order issued under this section or of any regulations issued pursuant thereto shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the foreiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law; and in addition any person failing to comply with the provisions of any such Executive order or regulation shall be subject to a penalty equal to twice the monetary value of the silver in respect of which such failure occurred.

SEC. 8. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, with the approval of the President, such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary or proper to carry out the purposes of this act, or of any order issued hereunder.

SEC. 9. As used in this act:

The term "person" means an individual, partnership, association, or corporation;

The term "the continental United States" means the States of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territory of Alaska;

The term "monetary value" means a value calculated on the basis of $1 for an amount of silver or gold equal to the amount at the time contained in the standard silver dollar and the gold dollar, respectively;

The term "stocks of silver" means the total amount of silver at the time owned by the United States (whether or not held as security for outstanding currency of the United States) and of silver contained in coins of the United States at the time outstanding;

The term "stocks of gold" means the total amount of gold at the time owned by the United States, whether or not held as a reserve or as security for any outstanding currency of the United States; and

The term "silver bullion" means silver which has been melted, smelted, or refined and is in such state or condition that its value depends primarily upon the silver content and not upon its form.

SEC. 10. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 11. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, but the authority conferred in this act upon the President and the Secretary of the Treasury is declared to be supplemental to the authority heretofore conferred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Has a bill been introduced recently on the subject of silver?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] this morning introduced a bill on the subject of silver, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I presume that bill was introduced in pursuance of the message which has just reached the Senate; and in order that the RECORD may state an interpretation of the message and the bill introduced pursuant to the message, I desire to take just a few moments of the time of the Senate.

The message on silver, interpreted in a word, simply provides for a wider use of silver in our monetary stocks.

At the present time we have gold in our monetary stocks; we have some silver in our monetary stocks; we have some nickel in our monetary stocks; and we have some copper in our monetary stocks. Also, we have eight different forms of paper money in our monetary stocks—gold certificates, silver certificates, Treasury notes of 1890, Treasury notes or so-called "greenbacks", Federal Reserve notes, Federal Reserve bank notes, national currency, and national-bank notes. The total of these various forms of money is more than $13,000,000,000.

The message says that silver should be added to our monetary stocks. In other words, under the terms of the message, and the bill which has been introduced in pursuance of the message, we are to make a wider use of silver.

The present status of silver is not to be changed in any particular. At the present time silver is token money only, and under the message and under the bill this status is not changed. We do propose, under the measure, to acquire some more silver, somewhere, at some time, somehow.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. In common parlance, we have another baby rattle, have we not; another all-day sucker; something to play with? That is what we got last time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in interpreting this bill I refer to the first paragraph of the message upon which the bill is predicated. In the second and third lines of the message we have referred to the act passed by this Congress during the early days of this session, known as the "Gold Reserve Act of 1934." That was an act dealing with gold as the reserves back of the financial system. In the bill just introduced, in the first section, we have the measure correctly defined as the "Silver Purchase Act of 1934." The proposed bill does not improve silver as a monetary metal. It does not make silver the base for the issuance of additional currency. In no sense is silver to be used as standard primary money. Silver is to be added to our monetary stock. If the bill should be enacted, gold and silver will be as far apart, insofar as they are primary monetary metals, as the titles to the two bills indicate. One is the "Gold Reserve Act of 1934" and the other is the "Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

I make the statement that if this bill shall become a law, the status of silver in the United States will not be changed. We may acquire some more silver; I hope we shall; but that is the only change that will be made.

Mr. President, the silver question and the money question have been pending before the Congress for a long time, but this message and this bill simplify the activity of Congress regarding silver. The bill contains, in section 8, a taxing clause. The message says, on page 2:

> There should be a tax of at least 50 percent on the profits accruing from dealing in silver.

Then in section 8 of the bill which accompanied the message we have a formula for the imposition of this tax.

That being true, this bill cannot originate in the Senate. It can be introduced here, but it cannot be effectively considered. It cannot be passed by this body first. Taxing bills must originate in the House of Representatives. Therefore, this bill has no place in this body, and it can have no place in this body until that feature is removed, or until the House of Representatives passes upon the matter and sends it here in the regular order.

If this bill is introduced in the House of Representatives it must go to the Ways and Means Committee, because that committee has exclusive jurisdiction of taxation matters. It cannot be handled by the Committee on Agriculture in the House. It cannot even be handled by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in the House. It must go to the Ways and Means Committee. Therefore, Mr. President, in the closing days of this session, a new bill, originating as it must in the House, must be considered by the Ways and Means Committee, and I think it is no secret that that committee is not friendly to silver. Silver legislation is a hopeless attainment during the closing days of this session.

Mr. President, before I close, let me refer to the bill in one or two particulars.

The first section defines the bill as being a "Silver Purchase Act for 1934."

The second section of the bill limits the amount of silver to be purchased; and that is an amount of silver in terms of money which is $1.29 for each ounce of silver until the total stock of silver, at such value, equals 25 percent of our total metallic stock of money.

Silver is not made money by this bill any more than greenbacks are made money. Silver is not made money under the terms of this bill any more than nickel is made money. Silver is not made money under the terms of this bill any more than copper is made money. Silver is not made money under the terms of this bill any more than greenbacks, national-bank notes, Federal Reserve notes, Federal Reserve bank notes, or Treasury notes of 1890, are made money.

We should not get the impression that we are to vote on a silver bill, making silver the basis for the issuance of currency, save the silver certificate issued against the particular silver in the Treasury. In no sense does this bill make silver a part of our metallic reserves on a par with gold in the reserves of the monetary systems of the United States.

Section 3 requires the purchase of some more silver. We have to depend upon the discretion of the Treasury Department, because section 3 provides that "the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States." That means that the Secretary of the Treasury can use gold which he now has and trade it for silver. It means that the Secretary of the Treasury can use any sort of paper money which he now has in the Treasury, and trade that for silver. It does not mean necessarily that the currency of the Nation shall be expanded a single copper. In the conferences where I have been present every agreement has provided that if we acquired any silver, we would issue against it silver certificates. Not so under this bill.

At a later date I shall take some time to explain more at length my viewpoint relative to the money question. I do not come from a silver-producing State. If any silver is produced in my State, it is very small in quantity. There is a large lead and zinc field in Oklahoma, and it may be that a small portion of silver is a by-product of the production of lead and zinc. So silver, as silver, has no interest whatever for me. Unless we can use silver in some way to expand the currency, and cheapen the dollar, and raise commodity prices, I am not interested in any sense in silver.

Mr. President, because I have a conviction upon the question, at an appropriate time I shall use some time in discussing the subject I have just mentioned.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I introduced a silver bill in the Senate, I believe, about 18 months ago, what was known as the "Cross bill" in the House of Representatives. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] introduced the so-called "Wheeler bill" as a substitute, and I have supported the Wheeler bill. Later in the same year, or in the following year, I introduced the same silver bill again, and again the Senator from Montana offered his 16-to-1 substitute, which was defeated by a rather small vote.

Some few days ago, when the agitation again began for silver, I undertook to persuade the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to allow me to offer as an amendment to the Glass bill, the agricultural bill, which had been reported as a substitute for the Dies bill, which came to the Senate from the House, and the Senator from Oklahoma offered his bill as a substitute for my amendment.

While I was in Louisiana, upon receiving a telegram from the Senator from Oklahoma, I directed a telegram to the Senator from Idaho, as well as to the Senator from Oklahoma, so that both of them might take notice of the withdrawing of my amendment with the understanding that it would be more or less acceptable to the Democratic and Republican contentions, to those who were supporting silver legislation.

Mr. President, I am glad to hear the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma, as plain as they are. I do not pretend to be a great scholar on the silver question, but I am very sorry the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is not in the Chamber at this moment, because I can give him some information in regard to this bill which I do not think he has.

This bill does not, topside, face, or bottom, give us anything at all, not a thing on God's living earth, and if there is any man in this body or outside of this body who does not know any better than to think it does, I hope that he will not let me get off this floor without showing him, even with my very limited knowledge of the question, that this bill is not anything at all but a measure providing that if the President wants to do something which the Treasury Department is willing to have done, the President may do it. We know the Treasury Department does not want anything done for silver, and we know the President is not going to want it done, and we know it is not going to be done, and even if the President did try to do anything, I do not know how he could do it under this bill.

I want this thing understood. I do not know whether it is as hopeless as it appears. If the silver bloc, the men in the Senate who are in favor of silver, will stand as I intend to stand on this issue, we are not going to take this all-day sucker and go back in a corner and be pacified with it. They cannot hand me any baby rattle and have me go over here and play with it. We will put the bill which came out of the Committee on Agriculture on something which goes through the Senate, and we will make a law out of it.

I was afraid that the Senator from Oklahoma would fall for this bill after listening to the very eloquent address of the Senator from Nevada.

Not a dime's worth of silver is produced in my State. We do not mine any silver, and I do not own any silver stock. I was hoping the other day, when there was an effort to discredit the silver movement, that the officials would find that somebody had bought some silver for me, because I have introduced about as many silver bills as anyone else has. I would certainly have claimed the ownership of the silver if they had found anybody who had thought kindly enough of me to include my name in the pot; but it was not found there, and I am only sorry it was not.

No silver is mined in my State, and I do not own any silver; and if I have any friend who owns any silver I do not know who it is. We are trying to get silver made into money in order that we can do what some claim they are trying to do with iniquitous tariff bill we have before us. They are here with a bill seeking to empower the President of the United States to become the treaty-making power without referring treaties back to the Senate, and to give him authority to levy taxes; and they are trying to do that on the ground that they want to restore world commerce. Do they want to restore world commerce?

The population of the world, I believe, is 1,700,000,000 people, and 65 to 70 percent of those people use silver as the yardstick of their money; and we are trying to get silver remonetized, not in order to sell some private individual's little stock of silver which he may have somewhere, not for the purpose of playing the market, but in order to have a recourse to the trade of the entire world, which we have not now because of the fact that we must deal with them only on a basis of silver if we expect to enter the kind of markets they have.

At a later time I may have some extended remarks to make on this question myself—rather extended—before the Congress shall adjourn. It is almost impossible to suppress the desire I have, although I hope that the gentlemen in the Senate who are seriously advocating the remonetization of silver in this country, who are making a serious effort to secure silver legislation, will be open and frank with themselves and with their people and let it be known that they will not take one of the remedies prescribed here simply for the purpose of putting the thing out the window to an easy death, but that they will demand that a bill be passed such as that which came from the Committee on Agriculture; and there is no reason why we should be unsuccessful.

It is time the silver people stood on their hind feet and were men. It is time for the silver people to be Senators. It is time for these people who have been waiting away back in the interior of this country for legislation to have it or to know why they do not get it. It is up to Congress to act.

We do not have to run away from Washington in any such hurry. These do not have to be the closing days of the session, when there is a necessity for this kind of important legislation, which ought to have been considered a long time before now.

Instead of having this "hurally" we have here with the tariff bill, we ought to have discussed the money question long before we ever started with this kind of superficial legislation we are considering now. We are considering something that was denounced by the party, considering something the party said it would not do, considering something which the President of the United States said he would not do, considering something which the President of the United States said would be a monstrous outrage against civil government and against constitutional government—those were his very words—considering something which was condemned by the leaders of our party, considering something we promised the people of the United States we would not do.

After going out and telling the people of the United States we would not do it, swearing we would not do it, pledging ourselves that we would not do it, telling the Almighty above that we would not do it, and calling the stars in as witnesses that we would not do any such monstrous act as is proposed here by this iniquitous tariff, treaty-making, taxing-power measure, proposing to take the power away from the Congress, here we are trying to do something we promised the people we would not do, and talking about adjourning the Congress without settling this monetary question, a settlement of which is demanded by the people of the United States, a thing which would actually give a market for our products, if anything is to be done.

I hope that this does not mean the death knell of silver legislation at this session of the Congress. It does not need to be. If it is, let us place the responsibility where it should be. Let it be known where the responsibility should stand. Let us take the bill which came from the Committee on Agriculture and make that the basis of our fight, and let the people of the United States know who prevented silver legislation and how it is that silver legislation was prevented at this session of the Congress.

Let us put ourselves on record here in favor of sound, sane, silver remonetization legislation. Let us do it in an unequivocal, open manner. We have tried in every way that it possibly could be done to get some kind of compromise. The only kind of compromise we will ever get will be a compromise that does not provide for silver money. I have said in the Senate for the 2 years I have been in this body that the only kind of compromise we are ever going to get will be a compromise which does not make money out of silver, and if it is desired to make money out of silver, the only way we are ever going to be able to get it is to put the people's will—and such is the people's will of this country, Mr. President, if I know anything about public sentiment—into unequivocal legislation expressly designed to make silver money in the United States.

I do not want to be a party to breathing death into this silver move. I do not want to make anyone's bed easy in the fall election. If the purpose of this bill is to ride this thing out, with the band playing so the people cannot see what we are doing, if someone wants to disguise the fact that we have a hearse in our midst and are rolling it through the streets, I am not going to keep up any bonfire so the people will not know what we are doing.

Mr. President, this is a hearse. This is not a bill, this is a coffin, and silver legislation has been embalmed and encased here with all the disfiguring disguises that can be placed upon it. That is all this thing is. It is not a bill remonetizing silver; it is a bill destroying silver legislation. If any Senator here has no better knowledge of the silver question than not to know it, then he knows less about the subject than I do, and I know no one in the Senate who I think is a member of the silver bloc who has as little information upon the silver question as myself. [Laughter.] It is plain enough to me.

With respect to the message concerning an adequate and sound currency, I should like to ask what is meant by "adequate and sound currency." We started out here a year ago with about six and one half billion dollars of money, and we are going to expand the currency, with the purpose of having an adequate and sound currency, and today we have less than five and one half billion dollars of currency—money of all kinds. That is not what I call an adequate and sound currency. Nor am I interested in any kind of suggestion that some one might buy a little silver from some one else, or that we might make it a little bit easier for the foreign debtors to discharge the debts they owe by paying us off in silver.

Our only concern, Mr. President, is to expand the monetary metallic base. Our only effort is to give the people more money, money which has a wider use, and will give our agriculture and industrial products recourse through a monetary exchange that is used by 65 percent of the people of the world, and largely used by the remainder of the people of the world.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, in connection with the debate on the silver question, a resolution on the subject of silver signed by Dr. Arthur B. Adams, of the State University of Oklahoma, and a number of other economists.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution opposing the silver measures before Congress, by the executive committee of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy

The executive committee of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy is gravely concerned about the various silver measures introduced and proposed in Congress and wishes to go on record as opposing all these proposals, whether they involve the introduction of bimetallism or symmetalism or the purchase of silver for the purpose of increasing our silver reserves or the circulation of silver or silver certificates.

This committee believes that the lessons of monetary history and the principles of money should have an important place in the consideration of monetary legislation in this country and, therefore, desires to express the following convictions:

1. That no additional silver should be purchased at any price.

2. That the purchase of silver bullion at artificial prices will not promote sound recovery, but on the contrary will add to the liabilities of the Government and reduce confidence in the Nation's currency.

3. That the restoration of bimetallism at the market ratio would cause national injury and retard recovery.

4. That the restoration of bimetallism at a ratio of 16 to 1 would be a national calamity.

5. That a rise in the price of silver benefits materially neither domestic industry nor the foreign trade of the United States.

Perhaps a brief survey of our experiences with bimetallism and of the past efforts to do something for silver will be of some service in enabling the public to see the present proposals before Congress in their proper perspective.

The double or bimetallic standard, as established in 1792 with a mint ratio between gold and silver of 15 to 1 (gold having a value 15 times that of silver at the mint), never functioned well. Our experience has been that of alternating between gold and silver because of the well-known fact that when the market ratio between gold and silver differs from the mint ratio, the metal undervalued by the mint will be driven out of the country or into hoarding by the cheaper metal. Since the market ratio between gold and silver varies from day to day and the mint ratio is a legal, artificial ratio rarely changed by a country, discrepancies between the mint and market ratios are the usual thing. The consequence is that when countries in the past tried to use bimetallism, they usually found that they had alternating standards—either silver or gold—rather than a bimetallic standard. It is for this reason that no country in the world has had actually functioning bimetallism since the early 1870's. It should be emphasized that a very small discrepancy between the mint and market ratios will cause the overvalued metal to expell the undervalued one. Yet there are in Congress today men who are advocating the reintroduction of bimetallism at the ratio of 16 to 1, although the market ratio is about 78 to 1.

The experience of our country illustrates this fundamental weakness in bimetallism. In general, it may be said that during the years 1806 to 1834 we were in a silver period, due to the fact that the market ratio between gold and silver was higher (as, for example, 1 to 15.5) than the mint ratio of 1 to 15. Most of our gold went to England and France. The coinage of the silver dollar was suspended from 1806 to 1836, and even our fractional silver coin was driven out by foreign silver coins and by the cheaper paper money. The result was that our attempt to maintain bimetallism during this period was very unsatisfactory.

In 1834 Congress changed the mint ratio to 16.002 to 1 and again in 1837 to 15.9884 to 1, the latter being commonly referred to as 16 to 1. This ratio reversed the relationship existing between the mint and market ratios, the mint ratio now undervaluing silver, since the market ratio remained below 16 to 1. Under this mint ratio relatively little silver, as compared with gold, was coined. Silver disappeared rapidly, and this included fractional silver coins, which were then of the same proportionate pure silver content as the dollar and were full legal tender. The resulting scarcity of "small change" caused great inconvenience in retail trade. In 1853 Congress discontinued the free coinage of all silver coins below the dollar and created the relatively lightweight fractional silver coinage, which, except for a minor change in the weight in 1873, we have today. The silver dollar was left a standard coin, but it was coined between 1836 and 1860 only in trivial quantities, principally for coin collections or for shipment to China. The piece was sold by the mint as a curiosity, at a price of $1.05 or more in gold. Thus, the silver dollar, from the birth of this Nation to 1873, was a little-used coin in a country that, though legally bimetallic, was in actual fact on a gold basis from 1834 to 1862, and on a paper basis from 1862 to 1879. The 16-to-1 ratio established in 1837 was never effective at any time in bringing the silver dollar into circulation.

In 1873 the coinage laws were revised and codified. The bill was before Congress for 3 years. In this revision the silver dollar was dropped. In 1874 there was a fall in the gold value of silver. It was then discovered that, if the law of 1837 had not been repealed by the law of 1873, the coinage of silver dollars at the ratio of 16 of silver to 1 of gold would have been profitable. The silver interests began in that year a propaganda to restore the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 which, under the new calculation, would have been very profitable to the silver owners, and they have carried on propaganda to this end up to the present day.

On four occasions the silver interests have managed to get through Congress legislative measures which gave them a Government subsidy. In 1878 the Bland-Allison Act, passed over Hayes' veto, commanded the Treasury to buy not less than $24,000,000 worth of silver bullion per year and to coin it into silver dollars. In 1890 the Sherman Silver Purchase Act was passed. This greatly increased the amount the Government had to buy. In fact, it was virtually an arrangement by which the Government was forced to buy the total output of the American mines. The people declined to use, to any considerable extent, the clumsy silver dollar pieces, except in the West, where propaganda and the expense of sending them in for redemption encouraged their use, and in the South, where the unfamiliarity of the Negroes with printed symbols made paper money unpopular. Elsewhere the silver dollar was very unpopular. In 1878 the Treasury had devised the silver certificates which enabled the clumsy silver dollar to circulate by proxy and which permitted the coin to lie buried in the vaults of the Treasury. By 1893 the bullion value of the silver dollar had fallen below 60 cents and over four hundred millions had been coined. In that year the strain on the gold supply resulting from adverse economic conditions and the dread of further silver coinage contributed to a financial panic which ushered in the grievous depression of the next 4 years. Subsequently, on the recommendation of President Cleveland, Congress repealed the silver-purchase clause of the Sherman Act which had been largely responsible for the panic.

Considering the similarity between the present efforts to "to do something for silver" and those of 1878 and 1890, it would seem that we might profit from a part of President Cleveland's message of December 2, 1895, in which he referred to the Bland-Allison Act of 1878, the Silver Purchase Act of 1890, and the agitation for free coinage of silver. He said:

"Twice in our recent history we have signally failed to raise by legislation the value of silver. Under an act of Congress passed in 1878 the Government was required for more than 12 years to expend annually at least $24,000,000 in the purchase of silver bullion for coinage. The act of July 14, 1890, in a still bolder effort, increased the amount of silver the Government was compelled to purchase and forced it to become the buyer annually of 54,000,000 ounces, or practically the entire product of our mines. Under both laws silver rapidly and steadily declined in value. * * *

"Every dollar of fixed and stable value has, through the agency of confident credit, an astonishing capacity of multiplying itself in financial work. Every unstable and fluctuating dollar fails as a basis of credit and in its use begets gambling speculation and undermines the foundations of honest enterprise.

"* * * I cannot rid myself of the belief that there lurk in the proposition for the free coinage of silver, so strongly approved and so enthusiastically advocated by a multitude of my countrymen, a serious menace to our prosperity, and an insidious temptation of our people to wander from the allegiance they owe to public and private integrity. * * *"

President Cleveland made other penetrating comments in his message to Congress on August 8, 1893, when he asked it to repeal the silver-purchase provision of the Sherman Act of 1890. What he said is peculiarly applicable to Congress today.

"The people of the United States", said the President, "are entitled to a sound and stable currency and to money recognized as such on every exchange and in every market of the world. Their Government has no right to injure them by financial experiments opposed to the policy and practice of other civilized states, nor is it justified in permitting an exaggerated and unreasonable reliance on our material strength and ability to jeopardize the soundness of the people's money.

"* * * At times like the present, when the evils of unsound finance threaten us, the speculator may anticipate a harvest gathered from the misfortunes of others, the capitalist may protect himself by hoarding or may even find profit in the fluctuations of values; but the wage earner—the first to be injured by a depreciated currency and the last to receive the benefits of its correction—is practically defenseless. He relies for work upon the ventures of confident and contented capital. This failing him, his condition is without alleviation, for he can neither prey on the misfortune of others nor hoard his labor."

The next favor to the silver interests was extended to them by the Pittman Act of 1918. Under the terms of this act more than 270,000,000 silver dollars in our Treasury vaults were sold for the account of the United States and England to settle trade balances with the Orient. In order to replace this silver, the Pittman Act required the Treasury later to purchase silver bullion at a price much above that in the world markets. This measure cost the taxpayers of this country more than $70,000,000.

At the World Conference in London in 1933 Senator PITTMAN obtained an agreement by 5 nations to purchase a total of 35,000,000 ounces of silver every year for 4 years. Under this agreement the share of the United States was not stated. In December 1933 President Roosevelt announced that this Government would purchase annually 24,000,000 ounces at a price of 64½ cents an ounce. This price was 21 cents above the market price for silver. The dollars resulting from these purchases will doubtless join the other millions in our Treasury vaults.

This, briefly, is the history of the silver movement in the United States. Before the gold-devaluation measure and with silver in the dollar worth as bullion about 30 cents, the market ratio between gold and silver was 1 to 70. Today, with gold quoted at $35 per fine ounce and with silver quoted at 46 cents per ounce in the world market, the market ratio between gold and silver is about 78 to 1, and the silver bullion in the silver dollar is worth little more than 35 cents. The Government is liable for its dollar value, and every additional dollar going into the vaults is a national liability placing an additional burden upon the gold reserves. Furthermore, there was incorporated in the recent devaluation law—the so-called "Gold Reserve Act of January 30, 1934"—a provision authorizing the President to "devalue" the silver dollar in proportion to the devaluation of gold. This provision simply means that this coin, legally called a dollar, but in bullion value worth much less, may have its bullion content reduced still further.

There are now before Congress various silver bills. One is for the sale of $400,000,000 worth of American products for foreign silver at a valuation 25 percent above the actual value of the metal, the bullion to be coined into dollars. The second is for the purchase of one and one-half billion ounces of silver. The third is for the restoration of bimetallism at a ratio of 16 to 1, which the President already had the right to do under the Thomas amendment. Still other silver bills, and combinations and compromises of those just mentioned, are before Congress. The first of these measures calls for a subsidy to silver producers and additions to the heavy Treasury liability for debased coinage. The second calls for the purchase of an amount of silver sufficient to destroy what little there is left of our American gold standard. The bimetallic proposal, if adopted, would be devastating in its financial effects and would force us on to a silver standard.

Since the prosilver advocates, in searching for excuse for their measures, frequently refer to the Chinese "situation", the implication being—if, indeed, the direct assertion is not made—that the Chinese would be benefited by the measure designed to raise the value of silver, this committee wishes to quote from the recently published book, Kemmerer on Money, the following brief passage relating to this argument of the silver advocates. Kemmerer, who recently spent a year in China, as currency and bank expert of the Chinese Government, says (p. 131):

"* * * China's commodity price level has been much more stable since 1929 than the price level in any gold-standard country. Since January 1933, however, commodity prices in China have been declining. The wholesome-price index number for Shanghai, for example, fell every month but one from January 1933 to November 1933 and in November stood at about 8 percent below the level of January. It is hard to believe that the proponents of silver in the United States, who have shown such great solicitude for the poor people of China and wept so many crocodile tears in their behalf, should want to adopt a policy that, by raising the value of silver in China and depressing commodity prices, would increase the debt burdens of the Chinese people and, in short, impose upon China 'all the hardships of deflation' from which the silver group proposes to relieve the American people by the remonetization of silver."

Congress, under this administration, has already placed on our statute books a series of unsound and potentially dangerous monetary laws; and to add to their potential dangers, or to convert these potential dangers into actual mandatory law, is to invite monetary, economic, social, and, perhaps, political disasters.

OPTIMISM NOT ENOUGH!—ADDRESS BY SENATOR HASTINGS

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by my colleague [Mr. HASTINGS] on the 18th of May, on the topic "Optimism Not Enough!"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPTIMISM NOT ENOUGH!

I am glad to have an opportunity to express my own views with respect to political-party policies.

Under the pretext that the emergency made it necessary, the Federal Constitution has in effect been emasculated; the principles upon which the Government was founded have been violated; a great democracy has in many respects become an autocracy; the legislative branch of the Government is virtually in the control of the Executive; the business of the Nation, both big and little, is being controlled by Executive fiat, and being taxed by the same autocratic power; the farmers of the Nation have been regimented and are being controlled from the National Capital with power in one man to extend gratuities or to inflict severe punishment; the processing tax is destroying many business men and increasing the costs to the consumer; the national debt is increasing so rapidly that the credit of the Nation must necessarily be ultimately impaired; the half-baked ideas of the "brain trust" are pushed into the expensive experimental stage by a nod of the head plus a stroke of the pen; new agencies to control new activities are thus created overnight.

In the midst of all the confusion created by this new deal, a very skillful and highly Federal paid propaganda organization is trying to make the masses of the people of the Nation like it, and because of this propaganda many millions of people have honestly reached the conclusion that the "brain trust" program is simply "grand"!

It is of great importance for a people to maintain an optimistic view if they are to be happy. Optimism and American individualism go hand-in-hand, but mere optimism will not preserve and save the Federal Constitution if there be those in a controlling position in the Executive department who believe that essential parts of the Constitution are no longer suitable for the social order which they desire to bring about; neither will it save the principles upon which the Government was founded if those same influential persons believe that such principles must be abandoned.

The people can no longer be satisfied with the mere hope and expectation that the legislative branch of the Government will perform its constitutional functions when they realize that a majority of the Congress are setting aside their individual opinions and following the views and wishes of the man who has become a temporary idol.

Mere inclination to look on the best side of everything will bring no relief to the American business man who finds his business controlled by a military autocrat.

A mere faith in Government and a cheerful hope for the future will not bring relief to the farmer who has lost his freedom of action, who has lost the method of control of his crops, and who is threatened with fine or imprisonment if he violates the rules and regulations laid down by an idealist in the National Capital.

It will take more than optimism for the average housewife to meet her increased budget due to the increased cost of all the things she is compelled to buy.

It will take something more than a cheerful and happy disposition to pay the increased taxes that must necessarily be levied to meet the enormous debt created by this administration.

It will take more than a do-nothing policy on the part of the people in the next election to prevent the impractical theories of the "brain trust" from plunging us into deeper troubles and more drastic regimentation.

The present administration program is dangerous. There are many millions of people scattered all over the States of the Union who are disturbed and frightened about the ultimate outcome of such policies, and it is essential to get that public opinion organized in such a fashion that it can assert itself in the one way provided under our form of government. A great opportunity to do this effectively lies with the Republican Party. A great responsibility at the same time goes with that opportunity. The Republican Party accepts it. The greatest progress and the greatest prosperity enjoyed by this country has come during the years of the Republican Party control. It is the only party that is in a position so to arouse those in opposition to a point where we shall be able to curb and prevent this dangerous program from destroying the form of government which has made this a great Nation.

Time will not permit of anything more than a general discussion, but there are two or three things that I desire to emphasize.

It will be remembered that the Democratic Party promised to reduce governmental expenses by 25 percent by eliminating and consolidating bureaus, etc. The American people are quite familiar now with the alphabetical list of bureaus, the exact number of which I do not know, because new ones are being created nearly every week.

But there is a new kind of a bureau, about which very little has been said and with which the American people generally are not familiar. These bureaus are too numerous to be described by letters in the alphabet. I refer to the various organizations that have been set up in Washington and elsewhere to administer the 428 industrial codes that have been approved and adopted.

On May 12 last the National Recovery Administration sent out for immediate release some of the details of the annual budget for the trucking industrial code. The amount fixed is $1,714,158. A detailed examination shows that at the headquarters in Washington there are 55 employees, and some of the positions and their annual salaries are as follows: 1 executive at $10,000, 1 executive at $7,500, 1 executive at $2,500, 1 manager at $7,000, 2 managers at $6,000, 2 managers at $5,000, 1 manager at $4,800, 1 assistant manager at $3,600, 3 assistant managers at $3,000, 4 assistant managers at $2,400, 1 assistant manager at $2,200. This makes a total of executives, managers, and assistant managers of 20 persons at an annual cost of $86,100.

But that is by no means all; $346,118.50 is set up in the Budget for salaries and clerical help in the administration of the 50 State codes and $186,000 for the same purpose in administering the 12 regional code authorities. This, plus $134,400 for administrative and clerical employees at Washington makes a total of $666,518. This subtracted from the total set up by the code authorities, leaves a balance of $1,047,640. There is no explanation in the newspaper release referred to as to the necessity for this huge amount. Inquiry at General Johnson's office indicates that $141,000 is for registration plates and distribution, and $121,000 for printing and distribution. In other words, the $1,047,640 is for incidental expenses in the administration of this code.

I have called attention to the fact that there are 428 codes, and I assume there are that many new bureaus set up in Washington to administer them. In this particular trucking code, there are 50 bureaus set up in the various States, plus 12 regional bureaus. That makes for this one industry, one bureau in Washington. 50 bureaus in the States, and 12 regional bureaus or a total of 63 bureaus to administer this one code. I have no information as to how many of these 428 codes have similar State and regional bureaus. I merely give this as an illustration of the extent of the regimentation of the industries of the Nation that is going on under General Johnson, and with the approval of the President.

Time will not permit of any general criticism of this important part of the administration's program. The criticisms offered by Republicans of this or any other program with which they disagree are met by taunts from the Democrats calling upon Republicans to produce a solution of their own.

The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. REED, in a speech on the radio last week, suggested that one of the things that the Republicans would like to do would be to get rid of the many nostrums that at the present time menace the country. This brought a prompt reply from the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee in a statement by the distinguished leader of the Senate, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, who suggested that Senator REED evidently would like to go back to the conditions that existed on March 4, 1933. This is the usual reply of the Democratic leaders, and they begin their description of the terrible conditions by calling attention to the fact that when President Roosevelt was inaugurated all of the banks of the Nation were closed. The real truth is that the serious banking condition which confronted the country at that time was due to the fact that Mr. Roosevelt had been elected President of the United States 4 months before, and during that 4 months had given the very distinct impression that his administration would not abide by his party platform when it declared that it was in favor of "a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards." The whole business world was struck with fear of inflation because of the attitude of the President-elect, who refused all invitations to cooperate with President Hoover, and escaped all responsibility with the light declaration, according to the press reports, that "it is not my baby." This attitude of the President-elect, at a time when the country was in great distress, brought on a condition the like of which the country had never experienced.

Of course, any President would have been compelled to do many things that were done in order to relieve that situation. People could not be permitted to go cold and hungry, and there was no contrary view expressed anywhere, and to try to create the impression that the Republicans would like to go back to this unprecedented condition is merely cheap, partisan claptrap.

I thoroughly agree that the most important job for the Republican Party is to undo many of the things that have been done by this administration, and do many things that are necessary to be done if the Constitution and the American principles of government are to be restored and facism, socialism, or communism are to be avoided. The American individual must once more be given some opportunity to initiate and carry on. The American investor must be encouraged to invest his money in those things that will create employment; the American business man must be given a greater freedom of action; the American farmer must not be bound by any rule of thumb.

This does not mean that Republicans are opposed to legislation designed to prevent frauds and improper practices by individuals and corporations everywhere, but it does mean that while such legislation must be made effective it shall not prevent the honest and ambitious individual from pursuing a proper course in a free country. When these rights and privileges are restored to our citizens, confidence in the future will immediately return and a normal and gradual prosperity will surely follow.

BANKING—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CUTTING

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on the night of May 18 the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] delivered an address over the radio on the subject of banking, which I think is of exceptional worth. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For a year or more we have been engaged in currency manipulation. We have juggled with the currency, and we shall no doubt continue to do so. The results have been small. The depression is still with us, and it is doubtful if we can cope with it by any such methods.

The reason is that only a small part of our monetary system consists of currency. Much the greater part is made out of bank credit. Until the Government takes control of this most vital part of our financial system it is not going to break loose from the burden of debt which is weighing down the Government as well as the private citizens of the Nation.

Most people think of banking as a terribly complicated subject, a subject which they cannot even attempt to understand. Of course, it is complicated in its details, but it has been part of the bankers' conspiracy to confuse the public by a discussion of the details so that they may lose sight of the main outlines. Those outlines are very simple, and they vitally concern the life and happiness of every human being in the civilized world.

Since from 90 to 95 percent of our money is made up of bank deposits, it is important to understand just what these bank deposits are. Part of them, the smaller part, comes from the bank's customers, who deposit cash or checks for safekeeping with the bank. But by far the greater part of these deposits are not deposits at all, in the real sense of the word. They come from the right given to a bank to loan 10 times, or 20 times, as the case may be, the amount of its reserves.

When you borrow a thousand dollars from an individual, he parts with his money before you get it. When you go into a bank and borrow a thousand dollars, what happens? Of course, the bank may give you the thousand dollars over the counter. But that is seldom the case. Usually you are satisfied by having the bank place the thousand dollars to your account. In that case, the bank writes your name at the top of a column in its book as having made a deposit of a thousand dollars. The thousand dollars is not transferred from any other account. It is made out of thin air. To that extent it increases the total amount of money in existence. To that extent it raises the price level, and changes the value of the money in the country. Yet the Constitution of the United States provides that "The Congress shall have power to coin money, and regulate the value thereof." In practice the Congress regulates the value of only a small fraction of the total amount of money in the country. The rest is regulated by the bankers.

We are so used to this kind of transaction that we seldom stop even to question it. We allow the bankers to inflate our money each time they make a loan, and to deflate it each time the loan is called.

And, then, there is another very important feature connected with this loan of a thousand dollars. When you get it you generally have to deposit with the bank collateral security of double the value of the loan. If you have a $2,000 house you will probably be obliged to mortgage it for the privilege of obtaining $1,000, and, mark you, of paying interest when the loan falls due. Yet the only piece of real value which has entered into the transaction is the value which you, yourself, have put into it, your house and lot, or your Liberty bonds, as the case may be. You are paying tribute to a private institution for the right to use your own credit. Your credit depends on your property, which really means your ability to deliver goods or service as required. The bank has contributed nothing but pen, ink, and paper, plus a risk of defrauding its bona fide depositors. Yet in order to use your credit you are forced to pay interest to a nonproductive agency. The bank has actually lent you your own credit and made you pay for getting it.

How can such a system be justified? It can be explained historically, but not defended on grounds of either ethics or public policy. The modern bankers are the successors of the medieval goldsmiths, who used to accept deposits of gold and jewels from their clients and issue credit which would be honored by goldsmiths elsewhere. As a matter of practice it was found that less than one tenth of the deposits would ever be claimed at one time, and so the goldsmiths fell into the habit of loaning credit to 10 times the amount of their deposits. It was essentially a dishonest proceeding. Yet people got used to it, and it had no very serious effects until modern times, when the issuance of loan credit of this sort has completely outshadowed the primary duty of the State to issue money, and control its value.

Sometimes it is easier to show up a fallacy of this sort by reducing it to its simplest terms. Let us suppose that three men are shipwrecked on a desert island. There are enough natural resources on the island to provide food, clothing, and shelter for all three, provided each one works at one of the three tasks. The three men might decide to go socialistic and own the island in common. We shall assume, however, that they find it more convenient to let one man own the timber, one the food crops, and one the sources of clothing.

Then, in order to exchange their goods, they will probably issue some form of scrip to enable them to barter. Let us suppose that the possessions of the three are approximately equal. Each one will then receive the same number of units of value, say a hundred tokens apiece. If they choose, they may call them a hundred dollars.

Now, this scrip really means something. It means the respective ability of each one to deliver a quantity of goods, produced and improved by his own labor. The wants of these men are simple. They manage to live. In course of time they improve their properties, and are able to live more luxuriously, with the expenditure of less individual labor. If it seems convenient to all of them they can issue as much more scrip as is needed to take care of the increased value of their production.

Now, let us suppose that after a few years of this, a stranger is shipwrecked on the shore of this island. He approaches the three men, and says, "Your economic system is preposterous. Your money is unsound. I come from a civilized country. I am a banker. Bankers know that a sound currency can be based only on a gold standard. I saved from my shipwreck three $10 gold pieces. Under the law of a civilized country I am allowed to lend $300 on that basis—or $600 if I belong to the Federal Reserve System. I shall be glad to lend you my credit if you will mortgage your holdings to double the amount."

Now, manifestly, if the three original settlers are sane they will reject this offer. But let us suppose that they have been touched by the tropical sun, and fall for the banker's proposal, which, you know, will not be couched in such simple language, but will contain a great deal of technical talk about discount rates, and the balancing of the budget. The settlers go in debt for the $300, and promise to pay interest on it. The banker does a little bookkeeping, and lends them their own credit. Of course he keeps the $30 in gold.

Now, suppose that the settler who owns the timber decides to install a sawmill. He will need help from his neighbors, and will have to pay them for it. The banker decides that he will consider himself a member of the Federal Reserve, and extends the settler an additional loan of $200. A hurricane comes along. The banker at once grows timid. He calls half of his loans, and renews the other half. The owner of the timber is completely ruined. The other two have to pay in produce twice the amount of their original loans on account of the deflation caused by the banker's call. At the end of another year they, too, find themselves unable to pay. The mortgages are foreclosed, and the banker retains the original $30 in gold, and in addition the entire tangible assets of the community.

Now, of course, this seems childish and silly when you are dealing with four people on a desert island. As a matter of fact, it is far less reasonable in dealing with a complicated civilization, and with 125,000,000 people. On the island, if only for purposes of self-protection, the banker will have a healthy regard for the feelings of his fellow citizens and will not press his advantage too far. Moreover, he will be in a position where he understands the exact needs of the particular community.

Neither of these considerations apply to the banking system of the United States.

In the main, the interest of the banker is opposed to that of the general community. He is lavish with credit in good times when it is not needed, and he withholds it in bad times when it is a necessity. Someone has said that the banks lend you an umbrella in fine weather and take it away from you when it rains. Furthermore, the bankers of the United States, even if we grant them the best intentions in the world, are not in a position to work in cooperation in support of any definite policy. They have the power to issue vastly more credit than is ever actually necessary. Sometimes they do this. At other times they issue so little that the economic system cannot be carried on. Then we get starvation in the midst of plenty, such as we are "enjoying" at the present day.

Our bankers may be compared to a number of theater agents, each of whom is authorized to sell an indefinite number of tickets in a theater. The total seating capacity of the theater, we will say, is 3,000. If 500 tickets are issued, or if 6,000 tickets are issued, in either case the results are disastrous. It is a hit-and-miss method.

In my judgment the only agency which should be authorized to issue tickets for the national theater is the Nation itself. Call these tickets tokens, or scrip, or dollars, as you will. The National Government must decide as to how many are needed.

For, mind you, it is not merely the private individual who is forced to pay tribute to this strange, unreasonable system. The great industries, the great producers of the country, who are creating their share of the national credit, have each one of them to pay tribute to a bank in order to make use of the credit which they are creating.

And what about the Government itself? Here we have a financial crisis, due in large measure to the stupidity of the bankers, and the futility of the system under which they are working. The purchasing power of the country has dwindled to a vanishing point. Millions upon millions are out of work, and have no means of support. The Government is fulfilling its primary duty when it comes to the rescue of these people. The amount that we are spending for public works and relief may seem large when figured in dollars and cents, but it is not a drop in the bucket compared to the credit of this country as measured in its natural resources, in its plant, and in its man power. Yet what does the Government do when it goes to the rescue of its needy and starving citizens? It floats loans through the banks. It pays interest to private organizations for the use of its own credit. The thing becomes still more preposterous when we realize that an enormous proportion of the relief expended by the Government has gone to the aid of the great banking institutions. So that actually the Government of the United States is getting itself into debt to the banks for the privilege of helping them to regain their stranglehold on the economic life of the country.

To my mind, this situation should have been stopped in March 1933. The bankers were then helpless and hopeless. They thought the end had come. They would, themselves, have welcomed a liquidation of their assets in favor of the Government. Now it will be more difficult. Yet the logical situation remains the same, and we are going to have to reestablish in the hands of the Federal Government the right which the Constitution placed there in the first place.

I am now preparing a bill which is intended to accomplish this result. I wish that we might have a chance to vote on it at the present session. If that is impossible, it will be largely due to the lack of public pressure, public interest, and public understanding on the subject. The creation of a national bank which will eventually have a monopoly of the issuance of credit is, to my mind, the most vital need of the country today. I do not mean that that alone will get us out of the depression, but it is the first step in that direction, the first step without which none of the others can be taken.

When I have argued this point in the past I have met with two general objections. The first is that it will put the banks into politics and substitute in making loans partisan considerations for sound principles of banking. Now, I have no doubt that, to some extent, this will be the case. Partisan politics have crept into most departments of our public life, and it would be rash to assume that banking could be exempted. But let me say, first, that no politician in high public office in the history of this country has ever made such a complete mess of his job as the private bankers made with theirs. Furthermore, your public servants are as good or as bad as you choose to make them. If you do not like them, or you do not approve of the way in which they handle their offices, you can replace them with others. As things stand, the people elect their Governors, their Representatives in Congress and in the Senate, and their President. But none of these men, nor all of them put together, has anything to say about what concerns most vitally the people of the United States, the distributive system, or the money system, if you prefer that term. Until the system is changed, the bankers are the real rulers of the people. You can vote for your President—you cannot vote as to who shall be head of the National City Bank of New York or of J. P. Morgan & Co. There is no reason why you should, so long as these men are functioning as private citizens. Yet at the present time it is these men who actually control the destinies of every human being not only in this country but in this hemisphere. I say this not in criticism of any individuals but of a system of bondage under which it is disgraceful for free men to live.

The second objection usually made to national banking is that it is a radical idea, and would be used for socialistic or com-

munistic purposes. This does not follow at all. A national bank might be used for radical purposes. It might also be used for extremely reactionary purposes. There is a very interesting article by Mr. Herbert Agar in the current issue of the American Review. It is entitled "The Task of Conservatism." Mr. Agar thinks we have gone too far toward socialism. He believes in going back a hundred years to the conditions which prevailed in the early nineteenth century. Let me read you a few words from his final conclusions: "The first prerequisite for a return to a system of private property is that the State should reassume its basic sovereign power—the power to issue and recall money and credit. At present that power has been given to private monopoly, chiefly on the plea that it is too important to trust to the politician. I feel no call to praise the typical modern politician, but it is fair to point out that his repute is no lower than that of the typical modern banker."

So you see that once you have control of the banking system, you may use it to carry out any policy which you choose. At present you have nothing to say about the policy which is to be carried out.

I have quoted from the Constitution of the United States, certainly not a radical document. Let me also quote from that classical exponent of sound finance, John Stuart Mill: "The idea of a rational democracy is not that the people govern themselves but that they have security for good government. This security they cannot have by any other means than by retaining in their own hands the ultimate control."

The ultimate control rests today neither with the people nor with the representatives of the people but with a body of private citizens who, no matter how high-minded they may be as individuals, are responsible to no one but themselves. Let us as free Americans resume that ultimate control of the distributive system which the fathers of our Republic intended us to have.

PUBLIC WORKS OF ART PROJECT—ADDRESS BY EDWARD BRUCE

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Edward Bruce last evening before the American Association for Adult Education. Mr. Bruce has been secretary and one of the chief promoters of the art project of the Public Works Administration, which has accomplished an astonishing piece of work in reviving hope in the hearts of several thousand artists through Federal patronage.

The exhibition held in this city a short time ago gave evidence of such merit as to encourage us to believe that no other nation in the world could have equaled in quality this exhibition involving over 3,000 artists, most of whom, because of the depression, are not now self-supporting. It gives us renewed hope that the new leisure, which inevitably must result from our inability to consume the increased output of our industrial plants, will be intelligently employed.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Last November it became apparent that the expected increase in employment under the Public Works program was not developing as rapidly as had been anticipated. To tide over the slack period the Public Works Administration transferred to Harry L. Hopkins, the head of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, $400,000,000 to be used in putting people to work throughout the United States. To carry out this program, Mr. Hopkins organized what was known as the "Civil Works Administration" and proceeded with his usual energy and efficiency to put 4,000,000 men to work. A definite distinction was made between employment under the Civil Works and relief. The means test insisted on in relief cases was waived, and employment given to unemployed at approximately prevailing wages.

With, it seems to me, great vision and courage, Mr. Hopkins seized the opportunity offered by the organization of the Civil Works Administration to combine relief to the unemployed with a movement which is bound to have increasing significance in the social and cultural life of our country. In addition to the largely manual employment carried on through the various State agencies Mr. Hopkins set up nearly 100 Federal projects.

These were classified as—projects benefiting the public health; projects to control or eliminate pests; projects which improved public property; projects having to do with statistical research and surveys; projects to improve, preserve, or survey natural resources; projects for the improvement or the preservation of public records and documents; and a few miscellaneous projects.

These projects, in addition to the actual benefits accruing to the Government by the work done, were intended primarily to give employment to the professional and white-collar classes. It is, so far as I know, the first time in the history of our country that the well-being of this class, who have suffered as much as any other class through the depression, was accepted as a definite responsibility of the Government.

Among the Federal organizations set up was the so-called "Public Works of Art Project", about which I have been asked to speak to you this evening. This project was organized in the Treasury by a grant of funds to it from the Civil Works Administration.

Its objective was the employment of artists throughout the United States for the embellishment of public buildings and parks with the product of their arts and crafts. The artists were employed at craftsmen's wages, and the product of their work became the property of the Government and has been used and is being used to decorate public buildings and parks.

To carry out this plan, a central organization was set up in Washington, and the entire continental United States and Hawaii divided into 16 regions. Voluntary committees were appointed in each region, and these committees in turn appointed subregional committees, with the result that there were committees in every State of the Union. The duty of these committees was to canvass the artistic talent in their regions and to select those artists who in their opinion were most worthy of employment on the combined test of their artistic capacity and their need of employment.

The artists when employed were given the maximum freedom of expression. The general theme selected was the American scene in all its phases; but subject to this general limitation the artist was allowed to develop his ideas with the guidance and help of the various committees and execute his work in any medium suited to his particular craft.

The project was carried on for approximately 4½ months, being brought to a close on April 28 with the winding-up of the Civil Works Administration.

Some 3,500 artists were given employment for various periods, and some 500 large murals and several thousand pictures, sculptures, etchings, lithographs, ceramics, and other products of the arts and crafts produced.

At the outset there was a good deal of scepticism expressed; but as the movement developed and its effect became apparent and people had an opportunity to see the work done by the artists this scepticism disappeared.

A national exhibition of the work produced has been shown for the last month at the Corcoran Gallery of Art. Approximately 600 objects by 600 different artists were shown at the exhibition, representing what we all felt was a fair cross-section of the work produced throughout the United States. Every region was represented.

It should be borne in mind in evaluating the exhibition that all the work was executed during the last 4 months. This fact should be remembered, especially in connection with landscape work, as there was not the opportunity for such a varied representation of landscape as there would have been had work extended over a longer period.

The exhibition received almost universal approval.

It has been critically discussed by the leading art critics of this country and is generally regarded as having been the most comprehensive and representative exhibition of American art that has been shown. It is my hope and expectation that the exhibition may be sent on tour throughout the United States.

The exhibition, I think, proves that there is in this country a vigorous, well-distributed, and highly exciting art movement. It is to me a fine and a surprising thing that the artists of this country who were given the opportunity to work at craftsmen's wages for the Government because they needed the employment should produce art which has in it no defeat, which is full of vigor, and which comes out of the soil of this country.

I do not claim that it is all great art; perhaps very little of it is. But I do claim—and I am reasonably well acquainted with the art movements in various parts of the world—that there is not, in my judgment, any country in the world today that could have produced such an exhibition as was shown as a result of the work done under the Public Works of Art Project.

I want to read you extracts from a letter I received yesterday from a friend of mine whose opinion I regard highly, and who has expressed my feeling about this exhibition far better than I could do it. He writes:

"After seeing the exhibit on Sunday for the fourth time, I can't forbear an enthusiastic line to you. Each time I saw it, it struck me more deeply as one of the truly significant events of American history. * * * There is something so buoyant and unrestrained and fresh, both in treatment and subject matter, that I am reminded at once of Walt Whitman. What he has meant to American poetry, Veblen to our economic literature, and Turner to our history, this project seems to me to mean to our art. I kept thinking Sunday of Turner's Frontier in American History; here is the frontier spirit in art, the awakening to self-consciousness and power, the galloping, surging triumph over virgin terrain."

I believe that the public works of art project, and the work produced under it, is significant in various directions.

It is, so far as I know, the first genuinely democratic patronage of art. Study the history of the great art movements in the world, and in practically every case the motivating force has been patronage by the aristocrat or the oligarch.

Probably the greatest patron of art has been the church. It is interesting to note, however, that the decline in church patronage of art was coincident with the separation of church and State.

Where it was not the church, it was the secular aristocrat or oligarch. The motivating force behind it was the aggrandizement of the patron. Travel where you will in the older countries and study the art that has stood the test of time, and you can classify the source which prompted it by the result.

In architecture it is either churches or palaces, with a smattering of fortifications, useful in troublous times to both.

In sculpture and painting, it is either religious subjects or work obviously intended to aggrandize and perpetuate the fame of the great or near great.

Many of these patrons builded better than they knew, as the images left of them or dedicated to their fame in sculpture and painting remain their only claim to immortality.

Against all this we find a great Republic giving its patronage to art and doing it in an absolutely democratic way. No high official selected the painters and directed their work. This was done by volunteer committees throughout the country who had no other connection with the Government except through this project. They were selected because of their interest and knowledge of the fine arts and sympathy with the movement.

The artists selected were free to express their own vision of the world about them with the knowledge that what they did was desired by the Government and considered an asset to the State.

The movement has gone far to take the snobbery out of art and make it a part of the life of the average citizen.

The project has, I think, been significant from an economic point of view, in that it is a definite step in the direction of creating the idea of service employment and affords what seems to me one of the most effective methods of answering the challenge of the machine and its increased efficiency and lessening of human labor.

It is obvious to anyone who has studied the problem that science and invention are producing a world in which the physical requirements of the people can be provided with the expenditure of infinitely less human energy than was possible 50—yes, 20—years ago. This has—temporarily at least—created a condition of unemployment, with the fantastic paradox of people starving in a world of plenty.

It is certainly a defeatist attitude if the world must abandon the results of human ingenuity and invention because through them people are put out of work. It seems to me an infinitely sounder way of approaching this problem to recognize that through science and invention human energy has been released to undertake a finer and a higher service.

With the recognition that such service is an opportunity and also an economic necessity, the machine will be recognized as a release of human energy to a finer field of activity and the world a richer rather than a poorer place for its coming.

It seems to me that this Federal patronage of art is the entering wedge in this movement, and I hope and confidently expect that not only will it be continued but that the service that it has and may render to the people will be extended in various directions, such as music, the theater, and a variety of other social and cultural activities.

In the last analysis, this Public Works of Art Project, if it means anything, means that beauty in our lives and in our surroundings is an asset. If through it a movement can be developed which will take the ugliness and drabness out of the lives of the people of this country, which will destroy the slums, demand that when roads are built they at least do not destroy the country through which they run as an unhealed scar; if through it hospitals shall be considered incomplete, unless the cell-like quality of the walls are enlivened by pleasant decorations; and if through it, it shall be considered a part of the proper cost of public buildings that their interior be suitably decorated and their surroundings beautified by landscape gradening; if through it there can be developed the feeling that human beings should not be called upon to live in the squalor and dirt and hideous ugliness of the average residential sections of our cities, suburbs, and towns; in short, if through this movement we can create a demand that America should be rebuilt as an America Beautiful—we are going to create not only a greater content and well-being and "a more abundant life" among our people, but an economic demand which may be a very vital factor in lifting us out of the depression and bringing us back to prosperity.

To emphasize what I mean, I wish that all of you would take a trip in an automobile from here to Baltimore and realize what that road has done, with its open cuts, its ugly fills, its glaring advertisements, its brash hot-dog stands, its blatant filling stations, and its destruction of trees to a country that was beautiful prior to its destruction by this modern means of transportation.

Compare it with what has been and is being done in that beautiful boulevard in Long Island, which is being built under the C.W.A.

Again, take the trouble on your next trip from Washington to New York to look out of the window at the suburbs of the cities through which you pass, and the cities themselves, at the utter drabness of the houses, the utter lack of beautification of the surroundings, the garbage dumps, the lack of landscape gardening and of trees, and you begin to wonder how anything fine can come into the lives of people who live in such surroundings.

The movement has been enormously significant in the effect it has had on the point of view of the artists of this country and their feeling of their relationship to the State.

In the hundreds and hundreds of letters which we have received from the artists the refrain runs through them all that the project has broken down the walls of their isolation, has made them feel that they are a part—and a useful part—of the world around them; that they have been elevated from an artist to a craftsman, a laborer worthy of his hire; and that the product of their work is not merely the last luxury of the rich, but may become the daily food of the average citizen.

Every one of our regional committees report that the result of this Federal patronage of the arts among the artists has been that under it they have created the finest work which they have ever done.

The work of the organization was carried on throughout the United States by a group of some 600 volunteer workers, who formed our various regional and subregional committees.

These men and women were selected because of their special interest in the fine arts. Practically every director of every art museum in America served on the committees, as well as people of general culture and artistic interest.

The effect of this association on these men and women has, I think, been significant. It is perhaps the first time that any of them has come in direct contact with the Government and taken a share in its activities, and one cannot read the letters that come from these men and women without realizing that something very vital has happened in their lives in finding that they may share in the activities of the Government, and that its interest has spread beyond the material things of life to cultural and spiritual things which are their primary interest.

The enthusiasm with which the project has been received by the artists and the regional and subregional committees was perhaps to be expected.

The real surprise has been the reaction of the public to the movement throughout the United States.

As originally planned, it was expected that 25 percent of the money received under the project would be expended for its executive direction and for the purchase of supplies and other expenses in connection with it. As a matter of fact, up to date, the entire cost, outside of the artists' pay roll, has been approximately 5 percent of the artists' pay roll.

One of the primary factors of this lost cost of operation has been the fact that throughout the United States the local interests and institutions who are receiving the work produced have almost universally supplied the cost of the materials needed.

In many places, even in small communities, this has run as high as a thousand dollars and has been met by popular subscription.

Our letters are full of the new interest that has been created. In New England alone we have 350 applications for murals for the towns and villages in excess of those we were able to provide.

Artists write that instead of being an unknown and somewhat despised factor in their communities, they have suddenly, through this Federal patronage of the arts, become the center of interest in their towns or villages; and that their neighbors are taking such an interest in their work as to actually impede it.

In a number of college towns the art students of the college have been turned over to the artists working on murals, and the work done credited to their curriculum.

Doctors and nurses write us of the extraordinary effect it has had on patients in their hospitals to have their walls attractively decorated. This has been especially true in the children's wards of hospitals and in crippled children's homes; and if I had my way, there would never again be built a hospital, especially for children, where the walls were not decorated with attractive and interesting murals.

In spite of the fact that some 15,000 works of art were produced, we cannot begin to supply the demand that has come from all over the country. This demand not only comes from expected sources, such as art museums, but from rural schools, town halls in small towns, and universally from hospitals.

Several school boards have already passed resolutions providing that no more schools shall be built without mural decorations, to be considered as a part of the cost of the original construction of the building.

All of this has, I think, a special importance and significance to those interested in adult education.

We are in a world which requires the expenditure of less time to provide material necessities and leaves more time for so-called "leisure." The problem we must face is whether that leisure is to mean boredom or the opportunity for a fuller and a richer life, with all the implications which it carries, not only for more contentment and graciousness in our lives, but for increased service employment and economic demand.

I believe that when the history of this administration is written, not the least of its accomplishments will be its patronage of the fine arts. I believe that through this patronage a movement has been started in this country which is bound to grow and blossom. I believe that it has helped to create a new and a finer definition of the service a State should render to its people.

In the last analysis, the art of any country is the ultimate measure of its civilization. Great art is not an isolated phenomenon. Art is and must be the manifestation of a national movement and culture.

And so I hope that art will take its place in this country as a normal part of life; that through it a finer sense of rhythm and harmony will develop in our lives, and that out of it will come a worthy monument to a worthy civilization.

DOES INSURANCE INSURE?—ARTICLE BY DR. MAURICE TAYLOR

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, recently there was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at my request, an article by Governor Ely, of Massachusetts, dealing with the Massachusetts savings-bank system of life insurance.

This system was devised by Hon. Louis D. Brandeis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, when he was a practicing lawyer in Boston. It provides life insurance for those of small incomes at far less cost than the life insurance sold elsewhere in the United States to the same class of people, which is known as industrial insurance.

Dr. Maurice Taylor, who is prominently identified with welfare work in Boston, and is the author of an outstanding work on life insurance, has written for a recent magazine an article entitled "Does Insurance Insure?" which, like that of Governor Ely, will be of interest to a very large number of persons. I ask leave to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Panorama of May 1934]

DOES INSURANCE INSURE?—AMAZING STATISTICS, WITH A SUGGESTION FOR THE NATIONAL INVESTIGATION OF SALES METHODS

(By Dr. Maurice Taylor, author of The Social Cost of Industrial Insurance)

When events deflate our pocketbooks we become students of their etiology; witness the banking and stock-market investigations. As laymen we know little about such things, and care less, until we are hit the kind of blow from which even now we are trying to recover. Post facto we become researchers into the facts; and have been getting them, in the form of an excellent correspondence course, through the press and magazines, in the principles of practical banking and brokerage as taught by our best financial minds. If we can absorb enough of this knowledge before the upturn comes, the heavy price we have paid will not have been in vain. But once the curve really begins to rise we shall cease to be students; we shall no longer seek for facts, and unless we have recreated ourselves into a new species, we shall probably forget to make use of the lesson so painfully received. While the course thus far has included brokerage and banking, we are promised that the next will be life insurance.

The last great course in the theory and practice of protecting widows and orphans dates back to 1905 and was given in New York under that eminent instructor, Charles Evans Hughes. This examination, however, applied mainly to the field of ordinary insurance, the kind that comes in contracts of a thousand dollars or more. While much has happened since then in this field and, therefore, a lot of new and searching questions need to be asked, it is to be hoped that more attention will be paid to the industrial branch of the business, the type of insurance that is sold to the lowest-income classes in amounts averaging less than $250.

Of the hundred-odd-million policies now outstanding in this country, three quarters of them are industrial. Despite this fact, the system is but little understood. It is a case of the one quarter not knowing how the other three quarters insures. The public needs to learn much more about how industrial insurance operates, how it is sold, what it really costs, and just how it affects the social and economic life of the working classes.

Latest reports show that life-insurance sales are beginning to pick up once more. They illustrate further the usual story: new sales of industrial insurance are increasing at a faster pace than ordinary policies, after having experienced a lesser rate of decline during the depression than did the latter. In other words, no matter how terrible were his economic circumstances during the past 3 years, the poor man who buys industrial or weekly premium insurance kept up his purchases at a more stable rate than did his more affluent brother who buys ordinary. And now that times have begun to look a little brighter, although less so for the workingman than for the person with more means, the poor man has begun to stock up on his insurance faster than the other.

It must be said further that although the industrial business has been practiced upon this country for nearly 60 years, not until these last 2 years has there been found much, if any, relation between the volume of its product and the economic condition of its purchasers. Whether times were good or bad, whether the pay envelop was full or empty, whether the poor man had bread to eat or not, there was but little, if any, hesitancy in the onward and upward rush of the industrial insurance sales-curve. The opposite is true of ordinary insurance. Its progress has been directly conditioned by the existence or nonexistence of good times When business has been good, sales of ordinary insurance have mounted; when things were slack, they have gone down.

What is the reason for this economic paradox? Why do people who have largely lived off the miserable American dole of the past 3 years reduce their purchases of insurance at a lesser rate than those far better able to invest in such services? The explanation is found in the method of carrying on this business. Upward of 65,000 agents have been let loose upon the land to separate the poor and unwary from their hard-earned dollars, on the theory that the most important thing in a poor man's life is to protect himself and his family from a pauper's grave. In addition, it is urged as an instrument of savings particularly for the children, who constitute at least a third of all those insured. The fact of the matter is that but an insignificant number, in comparison to the millions who participate ever achieve either goal, and the main result is colossal economic and social waste.

The business represents the acme of high-pressure salesmanship practiced upon a group of people comprising more than half the total population of the land. These people are for the most part ignorant and unread. They have no conception of the details of the contract that is sold to them, and that is paternalistic in its conception, burdensome in many of its provisions, unfair in others, and from three to eight times as costly as ordinary insurance, depending on the length of time it is carried.

The industrial policyholder suffers from a plethora of service. He is not only sold the policy, but he is, as a rule, compelled to pay his premiums to the same agent, who acts both as seller and collector. This twofold function must be paid for. In the ordinary course of life the poor man shops around so that he may buy cheap. He carries his purchases home and saves the cost of delivery. The rich man indulges himself in the luxury of having his merchandise sent to his home, being able and willing to pay the extra charge therefor. In life insurance, matters are reversed. The poor man is saddled with the tremendously expensive system of premium collection at his home, while the more prosperous man takes or sends his payments to the company. Only one organization permits direct payment at a discount, and then under conditions which reduce the saving in toto to less than 2 percent of the total premium income. This, it is argued, is a demonstration of the fact that the policyholder is either not thrifty enough or unwilling to take advantage of the saving. The fact is, however, that premiums must be paid for a full year without default before the discount may be received. More important is the fact that every time a policyholder transfers his payment from the agent to the office, the agent is penalized financially. The insured is more often than not unaware that such a discount may be procured, and it is asking too much of the agent to inform his clientele of the fact when he stands to lose money. In spite of these difficulties, year by year there has been an increasing advantage taken of the privilege. As slight as it is, an oasis, as it were, upon this drab desert of insurance, no other company has seen fit to grant it.

Another source of pressure arises out of the method of payment of the agent and his superiors. The agent not only collects but he has to sell as well. The average family has nearly 10 policies. Large numbers have 20 and 30 or more policies due to a subtle process of overloading. Gradually, the mother, who does 80 percent of the purchasing of this insurance, is encouraged to acquire more and more policies. She is unable to resist the persuasive agent, and in the end has covered herself and her family with a mountain of debt in the form of weekly premiums. The breadwinner's wages, which as a rule are rarely sufficient to provide even for the necessaries of life, are thus depleted to a degree that leaves an insufficient amount, in many instances, for the purchase of food, to say nothing of rent, clothing, and the other essentials. The result is an enormous volume of lapsed insurance which, in 1932, exceeded the amount sold by more than 11 percent. Between 1928 and 1932 lapsed insurance alone cost the industrial policyholders of this country at least $200,000,000.

The demand upon the agent for production causes not only overloading, but misplaced insurance. That is, insurance is sold to families who under no circumstances are in position to purchase it. The families previously described might have been able to carry one or two policies without too much damage. Those we now refer to are either without any income whatsoever, except that which they receive from charity, public or private, or have an income so small that they are no better off than those on the relief lists. Clearly, this group should not be urged to undertake such an obligation. And yet, investigation discloses that in normal years families receiving relief spent on an average of 11 cents of every dollar received in this way for insurance premiums.

A recent study by the writer in Boston showed an average expenditure on the part of the clients of one social agency of 14 percent, and of another of 21 percent of their relief money for this purpose. It is no flight of the imagination to state that during these past 2 or 3 years, when one out of five families has had to depend for its very bread on the miserably inadequate relief allowances (and since probably three quarters of these families are possessors of industrial insurance) a large share of the premium income of these companies has come from the improper diversion of relief moneys by the dependent policyholders. The truth, if it could be known, would stagger the Nation, and could not help but bring about a thorough inquiry into the methods of the business and its effects on the American scene.

The American wage earner is sorely in need of economic security, but industrial life insurance is no solution to this problem. Even though he were to benefit to the limit from its possibilities, he and his family would still lack nearly all that is their economic due. Provision of burial is the least of their needs. The tragedy is this: Had the more than three quarters of a billion dollars that this form of insurance costs the working class each year been applied to the carrying on of a comprehensive scheme of contributory social insurance, with funeral benefits as an incidental feature of the plan, the wage earner and his family and the Nation as a whole need never have passed through the nightmare from which it is hoped we are emerging.

ENGLAND'S RETURNING PROSPERITY

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on yesterday I discussed the return of prosperity in Great Britain. Mr. Kenneth Roberts, in a recent article in the Saturday Evening Post, commented upon the return of prosperity in Great Britain. I have taken a limited number of excerpts from his article, and I ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENGLAND'S RETURNING PROSPERITY

Prosperity has begun to return to England; and with returning prosperity, British automobile factories are working night and day to satisfy the demands of British speed demons.

And above all else, they point proudly to the fact that England has won back her prosperity without having recourse to the economic panaceas and nostrums that have been adopted by less conservative nations.

One of England's largest banks is Lloyd's Bank, and its chairman is Mr. J. W. B. Pease. "No government or bureaucracy", he says, "is capable of shouldering the heavy responsibility of saying how the industries of a nation should be run, or that those industries can be active and prosperous when confined in a strait-jacket designed not by those who have to wear it, but by theorists who think they have a genius for planning other people's clothes."

Managing directors and government officials declare jubilantly that prosperity has turned the corner behind which she has been hiding for so many lean years. Leading economists insist that prosperity has come back to England.

The Bank of England says that whenever its officers put on their silk hats and go outdoors nowadays they find the tracks of returning prosperity leading directly to the door of the retail trades. It is axiomatic among English economists and bankers who wear silk hats that if the shops of a nation are prosperous everybody is prosperous. They explain sagely that the final stage in the transfer of goods from producer to consumer takes place in the retail stores; and if the retail stores are busy, it clearly shows not only that the consumer has the desire and the price to purchase but that the producer is at work turning out stocks for the consumer to buy.

So, in spite of the calamity howlers, there are the figures of the Bank of England to prove that prosperity is returning, and returning without any new deal. According to these figures, the volume of sales for 1933 was a little better than for 1932, and sales during the last months of 1933 in particular were far ahead of those during the same period a year before. People bought a little more food and perishable goods in 1933 than they did in 1932. They bought a lot more suits and shirts and underwear and shoes for men and boys than they did in 1932. Women bought a tenth again as many dresses and furbelows in the last month of 1933 as in December 1932.

There is no question that English department stores did better in 1933 than 1932, and that they confidently expect to do better still in 1934. Harrod's and Selfridge's, the two outstanding London department stores, both showed a profit for the year—profits so slender that their very slenderness caused company directors to shudder a little when they spoke of them.

THE TRADE TIDE TURNS

Sir Woodman Burbidge, head of Harrod's, in reporting for 1933 the first increase in profits during the past 4 years, said: "The first half of our year's trading showed a small decrease in sales. It was not until we reached the end of September, in the second half of 1933, that we experienced a definite turn in the tide. From that time trade continued to improve until the end of our financial year, with the result that we can report an increase in the number of customers' transactions, an increase in the average value of transactions, and an increase in the total sales for the year."

He added that "The need for strict economy resulting from decreased spending power and the feeling of nervousness as to the future, which was so wide-spread, have both been reduced, so that the public have now the ability and the will to spend more for personal requirements and replenishments of their household. * * * It is a matter for great gratification to be able to say with certainty that we have passed through the worst of the depression of the last few years. We can go much further than this and say that there is a definite evidence in all directions of a recovery which is well spread over the various trades and industries of the country."

Mr. Gordon Selfridge, commenting on the increased earnings of his company and on the fact that it had served 567,000 more customers than in 1932, said: "Things seem to be definitely better. Trade and commerce, through their own united efforts and without governmental or other aid, are proving that the so-called 'capitalistic system', as the world has known it for hundreds of years can and will rebuild the structure of business which the terrible war and great governmental faults and errors have nearly destroyed. And we can see no other system, actual or theoretical, which can permanently accomplish this result.

"The so-called 'capitalistic system' seems to have assumed a position in the public mind of a terrible monopolistic figure totally devoid of everything except self-interest and ready to crush any who attempt to oppose it or stand in its way. In reality, the system is one which assumes the duty of the employer and the employed—the former supplying the capital and controlling the business; the employed carrying out the instructions of the employer. In this system the fixing of the policy and the general conduct of the business are completely in the hands of the employer, who becomes responsible for the results of the entire undertaking; and his judgment and his decisions must determine the course of the business. The wise employer confers with members of his staff as often as need be, gaining knowledge of the business as viewed from their standpoint. He is fair and just in his management and, while expecting loyalty from those in his employ, is himself loyal to them.

"Faults with the capitalistic system are faults of the individual and not of the system, and, while it has become the fashion to decry the desirability of the system, we have seen none other described or proposed which can successfully take its place. Capitalism—perhaps an unfortunate word—encourages enterprise, and when properly exercised rewards individual effort. At all events the business men of Great Britain have proved themselves and their system quite capable of surviving the storm of depression and, as we believe, of steering their ship of commerce into smoother waters."

In spite of slums, depressed areas, rumors of wars, and other unpleasantnesses, the Englishmen high up in business and government insist that England today is fairly close to normal conditions, and that she is certainly in better condition than any other important country today. In all the world, they insist, there is no nation so well governed as England, and for the simple reason that England is the least governed. Individualism, they say, created English trade. If that individualism should be replaced by an industrial despotism, as in America and other countries, England's good government would be gone; and prosperity, to hear them tell it, would be scared out of 10 years' growth.

WORLD DEPRESSION AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there has recently come from the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce a publication indicating the return of prosperity throughout the world outside of the United States, dealing with most of the countries, for example, European, Asiatic, South American, and other countries.

I have made a brief abstract covering four or five typewritten pages illustrative of the increase of prosperity in the countries mentioned, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD DEPRESSION AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

In a recent publication by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce entitled "Foreign Commerce Yearbook", some interesting observations based upon statistical studies of European, Asiatic, South American, and other countries are presented and are worthy of our attention.

The statistics presented for the various countries are carried only to the end of 1932 and therefore do not reflect the trend toward improved world conditions in 1933 and early in 1934. But they do indicate that the downward curve of the depression that had affected the entire world had begun to be leveled off in 1932.

In the economic summary in the early pages of the volume it is stated that:

"The low point of the world depression is placed by most authorities at about the middle of 1932.

EUROPE

"In Europe, as elsewhere, the severity of the prevailing economic depression tended to increase during 1932. It was a year of falling prices, declining production and trade, and heavy unemployment. The difficulties of international commercial relations were accentuated by depreciation of currencies, strict regulation of exchange transfers, and further restrictions on the import trade. Political developments contributed to the uncertainties of the economic situation.

"Industrial production continued the decline of the previous 2 years, with inactivity especially severe in the older lines, such as iron and steel, textiles, and machinery. Indexes of general production indicate a further recession during the year of 22 percent for France and of 18 percent for Germany. In Great Britain, where industrial activity in earlier years was at a relatively lower level, there was apparently little change in 1932; mining production dropped sharply, that of iron and steel continued very low, but chemicals and textiles showed some improvement.

"Prices, both wholesale and retail, continued to decline throughout the year. Wholesale prices were on the average about 10 percent lower than in 1931; the drop in retail prices was somewhat less. Prices in countries which had abandoned the gold standard remained stable or declined only very slightly. As compared with pre-war levels the discrepancy between retail and wholesale prices continued with wholesale prices usually well below and retail prices considerably above the pre-war figures.

"The tendency of wage rates was downward, though the decline was not very marked and was less in countries off the gold standard.

"Unemployment everywhere passed previous maxima in the early months of the year, and the seasonal improvement in the spring was much less than usual. The summer low was consequently well above the levels of previous years. During the winter of 1932–33 unemployment was generally slightly higher than in the previous year, but in the spring of 1933 there was a marked recovery which carried the figures well below those of 1932 by the beginning of the summer. The heaviest unemployment during the year was registered in Germany (6,100,000) and in the United Kingdom (2,800,000).

"European foreign trade fell off sharply in value as compared with that of 1931 but, on account of the decline in prices, the shrinkage in volume was less marked. Value declines of from 20 to 35 percent were usual, with exports somewhat weaker than imports, though in countries off the gold standard exports were relatively stronger. German exports declined by 40 percent and imports by 32 percent; French, by 33 and 17 percent, respectively; Italian trade was a third less in both directions. On a sterling basis, British imports declined by 10 percent and exports by 5 percent (on a gold basis the declines were 30 and 26 percent, respectively). The trade of Great Britain with the Dominions and of France with the French Colonies held up much better than their trade with foreign countries.

"Aside from the general effects of the economic depression, the exchange situation constituted the chief deterrent to international commercial and financial operations. Nongold currencies continued to depreciate throughout the year, averaging between 30 and 40 percent under par. In order to protect gold reserves and support their currencies, many countries nominally on gold continued to enforce strict regulation of exchange transactions, though toward the end of the year there was some tendency toward relaxation in this respect. To the same end, in order to establish a more favorable balance of trade, imports were restricted by quotas, exchange limitations, and other means, and exports encouraged. The prevalence of exchange control and import restriction led to the negotiation of various clearing and barter agreements.

LATIN AMERICA

"The depression which had already become extremely severe in Latin America during the previous year was intensified to some extent during 1932. The influence of readjustments and deflationary measures was in many instances minimized by political unrest, financial difficulties, and continued lack of export demand.

"The steady contraction in foreign trade which had been in progress since the beginning of 1930 became more pronounced in 1932. Foreign demand and market prices for most export products remained on a reduced level, and the consequent shrinkage in import-purchasing power deflected the source of supply in many instances to the output of domestic industries.

"This in turn caused a general advance in both scope and quality of items produced. As a result of this chain of events the expansion of manufacture, carrying with it a strong movement for protection in the more highly developed areas, became an outstanding feature of the year.

"Agricultural and pastoral conditions, with minor exceptions, were not unfavorable in their production, but disposal of the exportable surplus, notably of meat products from the River Plate countries, was made particularly difficult by quota and other restrictions on imports abroad.

"The difficulties surrounding the marketing of raw materials became the basis of a number of international trade conferences looking to a more favorable treatment of Latin America in the matter of foreign import restrictions, quotas, etc. These conferences, however, were productive of very little improvement in trade during the year.

"Political unrest was wide-spread and added to the unsettlement of trade in some areas by deflecting their buying resources from normal to military channels. A revolt of the State of Sao Paulo, Brazil, which was finally suppressed by the Federal forces, completely paralyzed shipping from that important region for 3 months. Established regimes in Chile were overthrown and replaced by revolutionary governments. International territorial disputes between Bolivia and Paraguay, and between Colombia and Peru, caused a heavy drain on national resources for the purchase of military supplies.

"Mexico presented one of the brighter spots, commercially, in the Latin American picture, for the depression cleared there somewhat toward the close of the year, with indications that business was tending to become more settled.

"The general decline in Government revenues, national, provincial and municipal, greatly handicapped administrative bodies and brought about a wide-spread curtailment of public expenditures, which in many instances forced a suspension of foreign bonded-debt payments. Currencies generally tended to weaken in terms of gold, and the shortage of foreign exchanges caused by dwindling export values, induced a wide-spread practice of exchange control which greatly handicapped the purchase of foreign goods.

FAR EAST

"Japan is set apart from other countries in this area by its more complex economic organization and its well-developed manufacturing industry. Developments in the first half year centered largely around the financial problems engendered by Japan's Manchurian adventure with the consequent inevitable increase in government expenditures. The first half year's developments were largely adverse, with purchasing power declining and with imports in excess of demand. Following new financial legislation at a special session of the diet in midyear, speculative activity was renewed, a decline in yen exchange stimulated the export trade, and general industrial activity revived; unemployment, however, was only slightly relieved, wages remained low, and agricultural conditions remained unsatisfactory.

"Chinese economic life was disrupted by administrative dislocations and by Sino-Japanese military activities. Foreign trade, both import and export, was seriously curtailed. The import decline was reflected in a heavy fall in customs revenues. Exports suffered even more seriously, not only because of sluggish world demand but also owing to the difficulty of getting products to the seaports across disrupted communication lines. In the face of these difficulties some progress was recorded in several directions. Construction work, especially road building, was carried out, and railways improved in operation with some new construction. The development of domestic industries was stimulated by a "buy native goods" slogan, the boycott on Japanese goods, an increased customs tariff, and the low silver exchange; foreign branch factories also increased, almost exclusively in Shanghai.

"Other far-eastern countries generally felt the influences affecting raw-material producers in other parts of the world. Of outstanding importance to India was the adoption of the Ottawa agreement giving United Kingdom products an average tariff preference of 10 percent. India's export trade was generally unsatisfactory, owing to slack demand and low prices.

THE BRITISH DOMINIONS

"The dependence of the British Dominions on primary production made them particularly susceptible to the prevailing low level of world commodity prices. The Canadian wheat crop greatly exceeded that of 1931, but poor prices reduced profits to a minimum, and the lowered purchasing power of the farm population was reflected in business throughout the Dominion.

"Low prices for wool, wheat, and other agricultural products prevented Australian growers from benefiting adequately from the heavy wool clip and the generally good crops. Business as a result was very dull. In foreign trade the export surplus was increased, as the value of imports declined more than that of exports. The financial position of the Commonwealth Government was greatly improved during the year.

"In spite of prevailing low prices, agricultural production in New Zealand exceeded that of 1931, while production of gold almost doubled. As a result the value of exports was greater than in the previous year and, with a decline in imports, accounted for an increase in the export surplus.

"The economic position of the Union of South Africa was dominated during the year by the exchange situation; the Union did not abandon the gold standard until December. Gold production reached record figures, but other industry was depressed. Exports were well maintained largely through the influence of gold shipments (diamond sales dropped sharply), but the value of imports declined by nearly 40 percent."

In the closing comment on "International Trade" (p. 342), there is a brief review of world trade in 1932, from which I quote as follows:

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

"International trade for the calendar year 1932, the third year of the economic crisis, showed a decline in both volume and value as compared with 1931. The aggregate turn-over was approximately $26,428,000,000 in 1932 as against $39,321,000,000 in 1931, a decline of nearly 33 percent. The decline was caused largely by a real reduction in volume and only partly by lower prices. The total for 1932 was more than 50 percent below the total for 1930 and more than 60 percent below the value of world trade in 1929. It was lower than the total for any preceding year since 1904.

"The movement of prices in 1932 was decidedly downward. In the foreign trade of the United States nearly all the important commodities declined in price in 1932. Some of the export commodities had declined steadily in price since 1928, many others since 1929, and a few since 1930. Between 1928 and 1932 lard declined from 13 to 5.8 cents a pound, patent upper leather from 37.5 to 15.1 cents a square foot, wheat from $1.25 to 59.6 cents and corn from $1.02 to 35.7 cents a bushel, refined sugar from 3.5 to 1.6 cents a pound, linseed-oil cake from $53.54 to $29.23 a ton, rosin from $15 to $4.79 a barrel, spirits of turpentine from 53.4 to 40.3 cents a gallon, leaf tobacco from 26.8 to 16.8 cents a pound, cotton from 20.1 to 7.2 cents a pound, gasoline from $4.48 to $2.34 a barrel. Between 1929 and 1932 refined copper went down from 18 to 6.1 cents a pound and lead from 4.9 to 2.2 cents, cottonseed oil from 9.2 to 3.2 cents, and lumber prices declined more than one third.

"Most of the import commodities had likewise declined steadily since 1928. Rubber went down from 25 to 3.5 cents a pound, tin from 49.8 to 21.1 cents, coffee from 21.3 to 9.1 cents, cacao beans from 12.4 to 4.1 cents, and tea from 30.3 to 13.1 cents a pound. All vegetable fibers declined greatly—jute from $147.43 to $62.27, manila from $200.74 to $62.91, and sisal from $145.10 to $50.10 a ton. Cuban sugar went down from 2.43 to 1.02 cents a pound, and the protected Philippine sugar from 4.08 to 2.70 cents, the margin between the two increasing from 67.9 to 164.7 percent. Cattle hides declined from 23 to 5.6 cents a pound, furs went down from one third to one half in price, bristles declined from $1.36 to 66.4 cents a pound, shellac from 42.4 to 13.3 cents a pound, linseed from $1.78 to 64.1 cents a bushel, wrapper leaf tobacco from $2.06 to $1.33 a pound, clothing and combing wools went down two thirds in price. Between 1929 and 1932 raw and combing wools went down two thirds in price. Between 1929 and 1932 raw silk declined from $4.91 to $1.54 a pound, or more than two thirds. The average of international trade prices in 1932 was nearly 50 percent below the prices of 1929.

"The economic crisis, due to the impossibility of marketing an excessive production profitably, first hit the nonindustrial countries producing primary materials. The low prices of grain, coffee, cacao, sugar, cotton, wool, silk, rubber, copra, the metals, etc., curtailed the purchasing power of the producing countries, and the shrinkage of trade reduced their public revenues, in some cases as much as 40 percent, thus increasing the burden of the foreign debts. Countries exporting largely industrial products found their markets reduced. The trade in manufactures, however, went on between industrial countries until 1932 when it slackened considerably, and the share of industrial Europe in world trade, which had been increasing since 1929 and reached 58.1 percent in 1931, declined to 56.7 percent in 1932. The share of the United States in world trade decreased likewise, though it was still somewhat higher in 1932 than before the war.

"Some signs of improvement appeared in the latter half of 1932. The prices of a few commodities stiffened temporarily in the summer. Industrial activity increased, and international trade improved somewhat toward the end of the year. Industrial and mining production, measured on the basis of 100 for the industrial activity in 1928 of 19 principal countries with 90 percent of world production, had risen to 110.3 in June 1929, and then declined to 69.1 in July 1932. It rose gradually to 75.1 in December. In the first 3 months of 1933 industrial activity declined to 71.6, and the value of international trade for the first 6 months of 1933 was one sixth below the total for the first half of 1932.

"With the exception of a few colonial countries, all the countries listed in the table showed declines in both imports and exports in 1932 as compared with 1931, the great industrial and trading nations suffering greater losses, both absolute and relative, than the smaller countries. In 1929, 16 countries had a total trade of more than a billion dollars each: United Kingdom, United States, Germany, France, Canada, British India, Japan, Italy, Netherlands, Belgium, Argentina, China, Australia, Czechoslovakia, British Malaya, and Netherland India, in the order named. The aggregate trade of these countries represented 73.4 percent of the total world trade. In 1932, only the first four were in the billion-dollar class, and the total for the 16 countries made up only 70.3 percent of world trade. With the exception of Belgium, France, and the Netherlands, all had suffered declines in excess of 60 percent between 1929 and 1932.

"In imports, losses exceeding 40 percent were shown in the trade of Denmark, Poland, and Sweden, and declines of more than 36 percent in the trade of Argentina, United Kingdom, Russia, United States, British Malaya, and Czechoslovakia. In exports, China, Czechoslovakia, Irish Free State, Switzerland, Poland, Austria, and Germany registered losses in excess of 40 percent; British Malaya, Sweden, British India, and Denmark, losses in excess of 36 percent. The exports of France, the Netherlands, and Belgium declined slightly more than 35 percent, while the decline in their imports was below the general average—29.3 percent for France, 31.3 for the Netherlands, and 31.5 for Belgium."

NATIONAL MARITIME DAY

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, today is the anniversary of the sailing of the first steamship across the Atlantic. All who are familiar with history will recall that it was on May 22, 1819, that that steamship started from the city of Savannah. Today is the anniversary of that event.

A very interesting editorial appeared in the Washington Herald this morning commenting upon the growth of our merchant marine from that day until this, and also on the importance of a continued development of the merchant marine.

I ask unanimous consent to have this editorial inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, May 22, 1934]

NATIONAL MARITIME DAY

This is National Maritime Day. It commemorates for the second time the sailing of the first steamship to cross the ocean—the historic voyage begun from the city of Savannah by the steamship Savannah on May 22, 1819, and completed 25 days later by the vessel's arrival at Liverpool.

A century and a quarter has elapsed since the cruise of the Savannah.

How far ocean transport has advanced in that span of time is told, in part, by the cartoon on this page, showing the pioneer of all steamships in contrast with the mighty Leviathan.

In proclaiming this year's celebration, President Roosevelt called for Nation-wide observances of the event, and accordingly public meetings and services are being held today in some 50 cities throughout the country.

Not only in Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf ports, but on the Great Lakes and in the interior States the day is being celebrated. This is as it ought to be.

A merchant marine is one of the great assets of a modern nation. It is not something that serves and benefits the seaboard people only. Every industry and virtually every community owes some part of its commercial well-being, often a very large part, to our normal overseas trade.

Furthermore, as the World War taught us so expensively, an adequate merchant marine is hardly less important than the Navy itself in the national defense. Without auxiliaries and suitable ships of supply, the Navy cannot function properly in times of great emergency—and when an emergency suddenly arises a merchant marine cannot be improvised.

It was our costly World War experience that prompted Congress, only a few years ago, to pass the Jones-White Shipping Act, and to declare as a permanent national policy the sound principle of Federal aid and Federal protection for American shipping lines—American owned, American manned, and American operated.

Under that policy the American flag has been put back upon the high seas where once it was supreme. And never again must this country permit the flag to be withdrawn from the world's great traffic routes. We must not, indeed we dare not, repeat the tragic and ruinous blunders of the careless past.

We must not again allow American commerce to become helplessly dependent upon foreign shipping for its foreign markets and its foreign supplies, or our Navy, in the event of future wars, to be dependent upon foreign ships as its auxiliaries, or our Army to depend upon foreign countries for the transportation of our own expeditionary troops.

Preparedness, which includes an adequate merchant marine fostered by governmental policy, will do more than anything else to keep this country out of foreign wars. And if foreign war becomes unavoidable, preparedness alone will spare us the shocks of disaster and defeat.

NATIONAL PROBLEMS OF INDUSTRIAL CONTROL—ADDRESS BY DR. ARTHUR B. ADAMS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on March 30, 1934, before the Southwestern Social Science Association at Dallas, Tex., by Dr. Arthur B. Adams, of the State University of Oklahoma, on the subject of National Problems of Industrial Control.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL PROBLEMS OF INDUSTRIAL CONTROL

By Arthur B. Adams

The N.R.A. was designed by the Federal administration to put workless people back to work and to induce money and credit, locked away or denied millions through economic collapse, to resume their normal functions of stimulating demand for goods of all kinds. The N.R.A. meant to the average American just what the national administration planned it to mean—shorter working hours, more people at work, more people to buy. But the N.R.A. has meant to the industrialist another thing—just another means of making profits at the expense of the public. So, after the first 9 months of this part of the new deal we have the spectacle of the Government having to take the place of industry in creating national buying power, through the C.W.A. and the P.W.A., while the industrialists, satisfied with the codes of fair competition they wrote, quietly raised prices, took extra pennies from the public, and sat back, leaving to the Government the job of restoring real prosperity.

As I shall hope to demonstrate to you, we are facing today the following alternatives, each of them filled with grave import to the Nation: (1) Abandonment of the National Industrial Recovery Act and, consequently, a return to the conditions which brought the depression of 1929; or (2) enforcement of the N.R.A. or a similar program based on definite and positive decreases in the hours of labor (the reemployment of millions of unemployed) and the maintenance of living, rather than minimum wages. If we pursue the first alternative, the probability of a new and more disastrous depression than we have ever before experienced faces us. Let us now examine our N.R.A. problems and experiences more in detail.

According to the preamble of the industrial-control provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the objectives to be accomplished by the enforcement of the act are: (1) The elimination of unemployment; (2) an increase in consumers' purchasing power; (3) a balance of production and consumption; and (4) an elimination of unfair competitive practices. Before the passage of the act it had been demonstrated fairly conclusively that private industry operating under the laissez faire policy of free play of economic forces could not accomplish these desirable objectives of bringing about a balance in our industrial system.

The act was based on the following assumption: The fundamental evils in our industrial system could be eliminated, or at least greatly reduced, by cooperation between the Federal Government and the leaders of the various private industries. This cooperation was to come about through the enforcement of codes of fair competition submitted by the various industries and accepted by the President.

After the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act the President set up the National Recovery Administration (N.R.A., under Gen. Hugh Johnson) to administer the industrial control provisions of that act. For the first 2 months after the passage of the act only one industry (the textile) submitted a code of fair competition to operate under the law. During this time the leaders of all the other industries preferred to remain free of the provisions of the act so they might take full advantage of the higher prices brought about by the Nation going off the gold standard. At that time (June and July 1933) production was greatly increased, along with an increase in sales and in prices, but employment and wages were not correspondingly increased. To save the situation temporarily, the N.R.A. put forward the President's emergency employment agreement to be signed by all employers in all industries and businesses. This emergency movement resulted in some decrease in unemployment as a whole, but did not increase employment to the same degree that production and trade had been increased from May to August 1933.

During the autumn and winter of 1933 the great bulk of the industries of the Nation submitted codes of fair competition to operate under the National Industrial Recovery Act. The public as a whole knows little of the nature of those codes or of the methods by which they are administered. But the public does know fairly well the sum total of the results of the adoption and application of the various codes. Prices have increased slightly since the codes were adopted; the volume of trade has increased considerably, but production has actually declined; neither total wage payments nor private employment have increased but on the contrary both have decreased slightly; however, profits have risen perceptibly. It is evident that very little has been done to accomplish the fundamentals of the objectives of the act. What little adjustment in the hours of labor have been made under the permanent codes have not resulted in a decrease in unemployment—but private employment has actually decreased. In other words, hours of labor have not been reduced sufficiently to make any material impression on the unemployment problem. Minimum wages have not been increased sufficiently to bring about an increase in total wages paid by private industry. But, production is being held down and prices and profits are being held up.

Practically all the improvements in prices, volume of sales, production, and in consumers' money income for the past year have been due to the artificial stimulation which the Federal Government has given private business by the deliberate inflation of prices and by the distribution of public funds through the A.A.A., C.W.A., P.W.A., and other Government agencies. Price-inflation policies brought about an artificial increase in the demand for goods last spring; this artificial demand resulted in a rise in prices and in production. The placing of some 6,000,000 of the unemployed on the public pay rolls has increased the total consumers' purchasing power in the Nation and has, therefore, stimulated the total volume of retail sales. It was claimed that this Government action of inflation and the expenditure of public funds was priming the pump for business. Priming the pump was supposed to bring about business recovery so that with the application of the National Industrial Recovery Act private industry then would absorb the unemployed and would pay out adequate consumers' money income to keep industry operating. But, instead, the adoption of the codes did not result in a large increase in private employment; neither did it result in an increase in real wages from private industry. However, business profits did increase. It, therefore, became evident that the money used to prime the pump was going largely into private profits rather than into an increase in industrial employment and wages to increase consumers' money income from private industry.

It is clear that under such conditions our industrial system will again lapse into business depression as soon as these public funds (derived from the increase in public debts) are exhausted. The workers now on the public pay rolls would again become unemployed, consumers' money income would again decrease, sales would decline, prices would fall, industry would curtail production, and private employment would further decline. In an attempt to avert this impending disaster, the Federal administration called a national conference on N.R.A. problems to meet in Washington on February 27 and to continue in session for 2 weeks. It was hoped by the administration that as a result of discussions with the various code authorities during the second week of this national meeting the Government would be able to secure a voluntary agreement from the industrial leaders to reduce the hours of labor at least 10 percent per week without any reduction in the weekly pay per laborer. As is well known now, our industrial leaders refused to accept any suggestions as to a flat reduction in the hours of labor, and in general they refused to agree to any immediate reduction in hours or increase in wages. In fact, so far, practically nothing has come from this momentous conference other than several threats of giant labor strikes. The question is: What should be done by the administration in regard to the industrial-control provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act?

It should be evident to everyone that if we are to have permanent recovery of business in this country under the system of private ownership of property, private industry must pay out to consumers an income sufficient to enable them to buy back the goods which industry produces. It should be evident, also, that between 1922 and 1929 the savings and investments of the rich were too large and the incomes of consumers too small to permit our industrial system to continue to operate. It should be evident, also, that we cannot continue to operate our industrial system by the Government (through the creation of public debts) furnishing a substantial part of the income of consumers, as it is now doing. Therefore, the only way to make our industrial system workable and still retain the capitalist system is for private industry to increase the percentage of the national money income which goes to laborers and to decrease the percentage which goes to savings and investments and at the same time to reduce the hours of labor in private industry so that there will be jobs for all of the employable unemployed.

The administration has offered the business leaders a cooperative industrial control plan, through the National Industrial Recovery Act, whereby they could cooperate with the Government in bringing about the necessary adjustments in our industrial system. Instead of cooperating to accomplish these necessary adjustments the business leaders, on the one hand, have stood for control of output and prices in order to increase profits; and, on the other hand, in order to protect profits they have insisted upon unnecessarily long hours of labor as well as inadequate wage scales for laborers. On the whole, our industrial leaders have attempted to increase their profit margins as a result of the codes of fair competition rather than to bring about the necessary adjustments in industry. Their actions thus far in reference to the N.R.A. would lead one to conclude that they are not different from the Bourbons of France prior to the French Revolution, who opposed all necessary adjustments in the rotten social and economic system of their time. It was said of the Bourbon kings that they learned nothing and forgot nothing.

Apparently, our recent disastrous business depression and our experience under the N.R.A. have caused our industrial leaders to learn nothing in regard to the necessary adjustments in our economic system, neither has this experience caused them to forget how to get fat profits out of any situation. Should they persist, or be permitted to persist, in this reactionary attitude, the consequence may be disastrous for our present economic system, as the consequence of the attitude of the Bourbons was disastrous for the social and economic system they attempted to perpetuate.

The National Industrial Recovery Act gives the President of the United States the power to change the provisions of any and all codes of fair competition upon his own initiative and motion. He has the power under the law to order a decrease in hours of labor and an increase in wages in any and all industries that are operating under codes. Thus far, the President has hesitated to use this dictatorial power on the grounds that the enforcement of the National Industrial Recovery Act should be one of cooperation with private industry rather than one of dictation by the Government. It is thought by many that should the President decide to use the dictatorial powers which the act gives him to raise wages and shorten hours, the constitutionality of the act would be questioned immediately in the Supreme Court. Also, some believe that the leaders of industry would refuse to operate their industries, should the President attempt to use these dictatorial powers in bringing about the necessary adjustments in our industrial system.

It has been suggested that the President ask Congress to reduce the hours of labor in all industries by the passage of the 30-hour-a-week bill or some other bill along this line. It is my opinion that it would be inadvisable to attempt to set the specific hours of labor by legislative acts. Hours of labor should be regulated by an administrative body so they could be made to conform to economic conditions prevailing at the various periods of time. In spite of the objections to the contrary, it is my opinion that the President either should use the discretionary dictatorial powers the act delegates to him in shortening hours and in raising wages or ask Congress to revise the act so as to make those powers mandatory. If the Court should then declare the law unconstitutional, the blame for the failure of the act would not rest on the national administration.

Since the industrial leaders already have demonstrated that they do not intend actually to cooperate with the Government in putting into operation the objections of the act, should the national administration decide that it would be inadvisable politically or economically to use the sovereign powers of the National Government to enforce the act, the administration then should ask Congress to repeal the act.

The Government, if it does not wish to use the dictatorial powers to enforce the act, should place the responsibility for failure of the act upon the reactionary business leaders where the responsibility rightly belongs. It is evident to us that private industry, without the distribution of public funds to consumers, could not long operate in this country under conditions of the free play of economic forces. I believe that an industrial control system that actually will bring about shorter hours of labor and higher real wages is absolutely necessary in order to enable our industrial system to operate successfully and remain under private ownership.

I predict that should the national administration ask Congress to repeal the act, because the industrial leaders have refused to give effective cooperation in its application, in a short time there would be a wide-spread public demand that Congress pass an effective industrial control act which would make it mandatory upon the administration to lay down the definite rules and regulations regulating wages, hours of labor, production, and competition. Such a control plan could be administered in the interest of the Nation and not in the sole interest of immediate private profits.

The new Industrial Control Act, or the revision of the present one, should provide for the framework of a 100-percent-governmental administrative organization to administer the act. The idea of calling in business executives to act as Government officials, who at the same time retain their connections with the businesses from which they came, should have no place in the administrative organization of the revised act. The administrative organization should be made up of public officials who act entirely in the interest of the whole public and not in the interest of any economic class or group.

The new industrial control act should prohibit the setting of minimum or maximum prices, either by the Government or by agreements in the various industries. Agreements as to reduction of outputs should also be prohibited in all industries and should be ordered by the Government itself only in rare and extreme cases. The act should make it mandatory on the Administrator to lay down the principles under which private enterprises in each industry are to operate in reference to wages, hours of labor, competitive practices, and profits.

Hours of labor and wages should from time to time be set by the administration for each industry. Minimum wages in each industry should be adjusted from time to time as business conditions and profit margins change. All industrial enterprises should be permitted to compete freely so long as they comply with the rules of the game laid down by the administration.

There should be an excess-profits tax as a part of the Industrial Control Act which would provide that all excess profits made by any business enterprise be taken for public benefit to help retire the public debt and to be used for other public purposes.

The labor provisions of the new act should prohibit all company unions, as well as prohibit employers from using any force, intimidation, persuasion, or inducement in influencing employees in selecting their representatives. Strikes and lockouts should be made unlawful until or after the National Labor Board has had an opportunity to render a decision in regard to the labor dispute. The domination of industries by labor organizations should be avoided just as scrupulously as the domination by industrial leaders should be avoided. Industrial control by the Government should be in the interest of the whole public and should be fair to all special interests involved.

RETURN OF A BILL BY THE PRESIDENT—COMMEMORATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF DANIEL BOONE

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the request contained in the resolution of the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), I return herewith Senate bill no. 3355, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 21, 1934.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a few days ago a concurrent resolution was adopted by both Houses asking the President to return Senate bill 3355 in order that a correction might be made in it. I now ask for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution, which I submit, making the correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con.Res. 18), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the President of the Senate in signing the enrolled bill (S. 3355) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, be rescinded, and that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized and directed to reenroll the bill with the following amendment:

"Before the period at the end of section 1 insert a semicolon and the following: 'but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models or master dies or other preparations for this coinage.'"

THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, leading up to the year 1929 we were not lacking in prophesies that a continuation of the course which was then being pursued, and a continuation of the kind of prosperity of which many were then boasting, would lead to consequences which would leave upon the doorstep of every American man, woman, and child economic difficulties the like of which the country had never before faced. One could not, during those days of so-called "prosperity", secure very serious hearing for any contention that things were not as they ought to be, or that conditions were not going to continue to be rosy for those who were enjoying the prosperity of that day. But we were finally led, as prophecy had it, into what is now reckoned as being the most serious, the most lasting, the most devastating siege of depression that any civilization has ever known. We like to count ourselves on the way out of that depression, and yet if one will but be honest with himself, and face the facts which are to be had on every hand, he must of necessity be convinced that perhaps we have made little or no progress in our way out of this depression.

We were led into it, I think, quite alone because we closed our eyes to the fact that the concentration of wealth and the concentration of power which were taking place during those days of prosperity could not bring us anything other than the hopeless mess in which as a nation we find ourselves today.

In March 1933 we inaugurated a national recovery program which was conceived in an hour when the country was sold on the thought that we needed in America a complete reversal of policy, a new deal, so to speak, a deal that was going to turn its back upon the economic gods which had been worshipped in the past, and a deal now that was going to have at heart the welfare of the American people, their happiness, and the contentment of the masses. Many there were who argued and felt that the national recovery program—more commonly known as "N.A.R."—was going to curb the great inroads which monopoly was making in our economic structure; that it was going to curb concentration, to break up the resources of the country, and afford a liberal measure of redistribution of wealth and of opportunity. Under the recovery program we were led to believe that the voices that would be heard in the future would not be those that had been heard in the past, sitting in their comfortable chambers in great banking institutions in New York, but that, instead, the voices to be heard in the future were going to be the voices of the American people.

We had through the years leading up to 1929 become worshipers of bigness. We had quite convinced ourselves as a Nation that we had outlived our swaddling clothes; that we were no longer dependent upon agriculture; that we had become primarily a great industrial Nation, and that our future depended upon the continued success which might come to industry; and in the industrial world we came to worship bigness.

We saw the dividend checks mounting in a way that indicated clearly that the greatest prosperity lay in the direction of greatest possible income for the gigantic corporations of America, and when in those days there was talk about doing something for the smaller man there was scoffing and peering at the thought that anything at all could be done to improve upon the prosperity that was then ours.

There were words of caution to the effect that if we did not decentralize industry and wealth the time would come when the smaller business men of that day would become the servants and the mere agents of great and powerful corporations in America. That this would not be good for the country had been foreseen for generations. Justice Peckham, as long as 34 years ago, discussing the problem of trusts and monopolies, declared:

In this light it is not material that the price of an article may be lowered. It is the power of the combination to raise it, and the result in any event is unfortunate for the country, by depriving it of the services of a large number of small but independent dealers who are familiar with the business and who had spent their lives in it and who supported themselves and their families from the small profits realized therein. Whether they be able to find other avenues to earn their livelihood is not so material, because it is not for the real prosperity of any country that such changes should occur which result in transferring an independent business man, the head of his establishment, small though it might be, into a mere servant or agent of a corporation for selling the commodities which he once manufactured or dealt in, having no voice in shaping the business policy of the company, and bound to obey the orders issued by others. Nor is it for the substantial interests of the country that any one commodity should be within the sole will of one powerful combination of capital.

So much for Justice Peckham's warning, a warning, however, to which we were paying little heed in those great years of prosperity leading up to 1929.

Under N.R.A. we were hoping for larger help; for greater aid to the small industries of America. Some of us looked upon N.R.A. as an institution which was going to afford the small industries of America a better chance for fair play in that bitter feud of competition wherein the great corporations were leaving no stone unturned to accomplish the demoralization and destruction of small industry, or anything that remained in the way of competition in their path.

Just what has been done by the N.R.A. is, of course, debatable; but I say, with all sincerity, that under the N.R.A. monopolies and trusts have become more powerfully entrenched than ever they were entrenched before. Again, too, I say, with all sincerity, that the small industrial operator in America has never been up against such odds as have been placed in his path by reason of the codes which have been adopted under the N.R.A.

Because these charges were generally being made, last fall there was appointed a Review Board, under instructions to study the operation of these codes, to determine whether small industry was being discriminated against, to determine whether monopoly was being more strongly entrenched, and to report its findings to the President of the United States. Today and yesterday, following the publication of that report, which is known as the "report of the Darrow Review Board", we must, of necessity, draw the conclusion that the attitude which has been shown by departments of the Government under the present administration indicates that there is little or no sympathy left for small business. The play, so far as N.R.A. is concerned, is plainly a play intended to lend larger aid to monopoly and would-be monopolists.

One wonders today at the real purpose which was behind N.R.A. and its formation. One wonders if it is at all true that people with a new thought, with an advanced thought, were really creating the national recovery program, or, instead, was N.R.A. the mere creature and creation of the same monopolists who were guiding the destinies of America's economic structure so successfully leading up to the days of the new deal.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Is it not a fact that most of those who represented the larger industries of this country were enthusiastically in favor of the adoption of the Industrial Recovery Act during the time when it was being considered by the Senate?

Mr. NYE. At the time it was being considered I think the public was being led to believe that big business, so to speak, was rather unalterably opposed to the program, but was going to accept it for want of any better program being suggested. In any event, very recently we have been advised that N.R.A. was the creature of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

The "brain trust" has been charged with bringing N.R.A. into being, so freely charged that one of the chief so-called "brain trusters" of the land saw fit not many days ago to announce in an address he was delivering in New York City, as follows:

> With General Johnson I went over a number of plans, not one of which was prepared by a professor. Prof. Rexford G. Tugwell did not know a thing about it; but I learned the same day that there was a conference of industrialists going on regarding plans for industry, and that it was being held in the office of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. That was where the N.R.A. started.

The author of that address was none other than Professor Moley, at one time, I presume, the chief "brain truster" of them all in this administration and one who yet speaks with considerable authority.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I wonder if the Senator has given any thought to another element in the beginning of the N.R.A.? I remember being asked by a trustee of the Brookings Institute to a meeting in which they explained the proposal of the N.R.A. and took entire credit for the idea. That meeting was held under the auspices of Mr. Bernard Baruch.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I think the Brookings Institute was under Mr. Baruch.

Mr. WALCOTT. No; but Mr. Baruch was interested in this program, and he was there as a sort of a sponsor for this meeting.

Mr. LONG. I understand that it has been claimed and admitted that Mr. Baruch was the bright mind behind the N.R.A. thought. I understood that had been stated on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WALCOTT. I think it has been, and I think also that the Brookings Institute was very largely responsible for the whole program.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Baruch, as will be remembered, had a long magazine article at the close of Mr. Hoover's administration, complimenting that administration very considerably. In other words, Mr. Baruch, as will probably be remembered, in an article in the American Magazine, went on to state that the chain-store system and the things of that kind were the growth of science and development and were necessary to this country, and the codes are right down that alley; they are along that same line.

Mr. NYE. We are advised quite definitely, too, that Mr. Johnson, who is now head of the N.R.A., was one of Mr. Baruch's organization.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield, I made that statement on the floor, and I was called out by Mr. Johnson and told that that was true.

Mr. NYE. That it was true?

Mr. LONG. Yes; that General Johnson was one of Mr. Baruch's men. I honor the gentleman for his frankness.

Mr. NYE. In any undertaking to show who is responsible for N.R.A., I think it ought to be noted that selfishness and greed, whenever a national emergency has existed, have gone forward and entrenched themselves more thoroughly than they were ever intrenched before. During the days of the World War, reverting now to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 2, 1917, we find Mr. Reed, then a very able Senator from Missouri, declaring concerning what was taking place in Washington at that time:

> I might say that, of course, it is indisputable that practically all the big trusts and monopolies have mobilized in the Munsey Building, and while the boys from the farms, the factories, and the banking houses in all parts of the country are being mobilized in military camps to be later sent to the trenches in foreign lands, these gentlemen, who control products which the Government must use, are making contracts here for their own use, enrichment, and benefit.

So, in the name of a great economic emergency, such as confronted us last year, starting with March, again we found those disciples of selfishness and greed here building for the future, building the machinery that was to wear the cloak of a new deal.

I repeat, Mr. President, under the National Recovery Administration, and its policy such as has been pursued, monopoly has been enthroned as it was never enthroned before in America. Weekly there come from the N.R.A. releases, bulletins, always bearing some interesting imprint upon the back. A very recent one now before me bears this very interesting heading:

> Truly the Blue Eagle has been a bluebird of happiness.

That is a beautiful thought; a beautiful phrase. The blue eagle has been a bird of happiness—happiness for a few Americans, as I shall clearly reveal here this afternoon, but a bird of prey as regards the masses of the American people, and particularly the small independent business man who might be engaged in this or that line of industry.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I notice that there has been considerable criticism about the National Review Board. As I understood that Board was appointed by the President of the United States to pass on the N.R.A. I read the first charge in the report of the National Review Board, headed by Mr. Darrow, wherein it is stated that they had reinstituted the old Pittsburgh-plus system. I called in some of my traffic friends and I was surprised to find that what the traffic men—I was one of them at one time, engaged in traffic work—had fought for a number of years to do away with the Pittsburgh-plus system, particularly in the Southern States, had been reinstated.

Senators probably know what the Pittsburgh-plus system is, but if there are any who do not know what it is, I will say it is a system by which steel is valued at so much, according to the price at Pittsburgh plus the freight. If I bought steel in New Orleans, it had to be valued on the price at Pittsburgh plus the freight from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, regardless of where it was produced. That fictitious freight charge had to be added. We fought for a number of years in the South to get rid of the Pittsburgh-plus system, and I thought it was over with; I thought they could never put it back; I thought that every man, woman, and child had been apprised of how we had been swindled by the trust organization by this supposed-to-be basic-rate theory, and that it never could come back. Mr. Darrow's report shows, however, backed up by the Federal Trade Commission, that they have actually brought back that old, old system, although in some instances Chicago may be used as the basing point for making this fictitious freight charge. That practically means that industry has not a chance; it cannot get its head above water ever to compete with the Steel Trust in the United States again.

Mr. NYE. Of course, that is precisely what it means, Mr. President, and yet in the face of the findings which have been made by the Federal Trade Commission and, I understand, by the Department of Justice, the Darrow report, and other agencies, we are confronted morning, noon, and night with a program of deception at the hands of those who are in control of the administration of the N.R.A. program—deception intended to blind the American people to the tremendous and terrible inroads monopoly is making from day to day under the N.R.A. program. There is endless evidence of how monopoly is being aided; there is no end of evidence as to how small business men are being stricken from the picture entirely, and yet Mr. Johnson and Mr. Richberg are ever "Johnnies on the spot" with the assurance that most emphatically N.R.A. is not aiding monopoly, that N.R.A. is the friend of the small business man and the small operator. If they do not realize that they are deceiving the public by their attitude, then I presume it is only fair for us to say here that they are deceiving themselves in no uncertain way.

The Darrow report, submitted to the President and made public yesterday morning, was presented in a way unfortunately which has permitted the public to be given a picture which is not truly reflective of the minds of the National Recovery Review Board. When the main report by the Board was submitted to the President, revealing the Board's findings respecting seven or eight codes, two of the six members of the Board submitted at one and the same time, without the knowledge of the other members of the Board, a so-called "supplemental report." It was not intended to be a Board report to the President, but Mr. Johnson and Mr. Richberg have seized upon that supplemental report and have made such use of it as would best enable them to keep the American public and American officialdom blind to the real merit of the so-called "Darrow report", which was concurred in by five of the Board's six members. Mr. Johnson and Mr. Richberg would have us see nothing more than that supplemental report. They would not for a moment permit us to dwell upon or give consideration to the merit or lack of merit in the report of the Board itself.

Mr. Richberg, counsel for the Board, countered the report by the Darrow Board with a response which I think time will record as having been a most shameful one. Mr. Richberg's attack upon Mr. Darrow was wholly uncalled for. Quite directly he calls the chairman of the Review Board "a philosophic anarchist." Mr. Darrow is well able to take care of himself in any controversy with Mr. Richberg, but, Mr. President, if Mr. Richberg is displeased with Mr. Darrow's presence upon that Board, if Mr. Richberg thinks that Mr. Darrow was there for the purpose of destroying N.R.A., I want the record to be just as clear as it can be made that the first man who suggested the availability of Clarence Darrow for a place on that Review Board was none other than the same Donald Richberg.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, Mr. Richberg is the man who proposed Mr. Darrow's name, but who appointed all these men? Did not the President of the United States appoint them? They were appointed by the President of the United States, were they not?

Mr. NYE. If the record is not already clear in that respect let it now be made clear. When Mr. Johnson and the President were finally prevailed upon to create this Review Board I was asked to recommend possible appointees. I gladly did so. Four of the five whom I recommended were appointed and have served upon the Board. Another member of the Board was recommended by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I am sure the Senator from North Carolina need make no defense of the splendid record of his nominee upon the Board. Certainly I am not going to apologize for the work done by those whom I had the favor of recommending for appointment upon the Board.

Each and every one of those men when he took his place upon the Board, took it with a heart full of sympathy for the administration, entertaining a keen desire to help salvage whatever in N.R.A. was worthy of salvage. But today that Board is made to stand up as being one conceived in an hour when men wanted to plant dynamite, sow the seeds of discord, destroy the program, embarrass the administration—and no one knows better than Mr. Richberg and Mr. Johnson that such was not the case at all.

Mr. LONG rose.

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand, the N.R.A. decided to be investigated and themselves named the chairman who was to investigate them. It was a pretty liberal thing for the men who were going to be investigated to name the man who was going to be in charge of the investigation. If they cannot come through clean with a good bill of health in a case like that, I do not know what else we can do for them.

Here is the gang the whole world is already against. When I say "the whole world", I mean about everybody I have seen who is not personally picking somebody's pocket through the N.R.A. Everybody is against them, with the exception of the pickpocket industry. The N.R.A. is a universally disliked organization.

I use the term "pickpocket" as a charitable expression. There are very few pickpockets who affect more than a few men at a time. I want to be charitable about this matter. I have nothing against the pickpocket that justifies them being compared to N.R.A. But here these pickpockets come in and say, "If you are going to investigate me, Mr. NYE, I want it understood that I would like to name the chairman of the investigating committee."

If I understood correctly the Senator from North Dakota, Mr. Richberg uttered the first word about naming Mr. Darrow as chairman of the investigating Board. Then Mr. Darrow comes out in his report and says, "This gang is twofold worse than the sons of hell, worse than the people thought it was," and he raises the point that these men never ought to have been picked in the beginning. That is the funniest thing I ever heard of. I understand that after the N.R.A. officials named the chairman of the Board which they wanted created to investigate them, and the President appointed all the balance of the members of the Board, then because the Board found they were doing what everybody knew they were doing anyway, they want to fire the Board. In other words, if we arrest a bank robber and the judge sentences him to 16 years in the penitentiary, the bank robber wants the judge removed from the bench because he is sent to the penitentiary. That is akin to the situation we have here.

Mr. NYE. The Senator has stated it very well. [Laughter.]

Let me cite just one more example of the intemperate military arrogance that has existed on the part of the administrator of N.R.A. almost from the moment of his assuming his duties in N.R.A. That arrogance, that intemperate attitude, that militaristic attitude has so thoroughly demoralized the personnel in N.R.A. that the minute this session of Congress shall adjourn—I rather think they are going to be able to put it off until then—there will be such wholesale resignations from within N.R.A. that we will be made to wonder what sort of attitude or leadership could exist to create the great displeasure that exists there. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who is not able to reach out into N.R.A. and find one or more of the personnel who will privately reveal some of the terrible things, in their estimation, which have been taking place under N.R.A.

Yesterday General Johnson saw fit to make available to the press and the public copies of correspondence which had been exchanged between himself and myself during the months leading up to the formation of the new Board. Strangely there was some letters missing. Strangely some of the letters which were exchanged were not given to the press for publication. For the life of me I cannot discover what the letters which he published were intended to reveal. I cannot understand what General Johnson found in them to afford any solace at all. I wonder why he did not publish, for example, or make available for publication the letter he had written and the letter Mr. Richberg had written late in last November and early in December concerning one of the codes which was under question.

We are told repeatedly by these heads of N.R.A. that they invite criticism, that they appreciate criticism, that they know all the things they have done are not going to be right, and they want to right them when wrongs are found. I want to show how very sincere they have been in this regard.

Late in November I wrote General Johnson revealing the experience which had been that of the independents in the electrical manufacturing field. I revealed in that letter a conviction that the code which had been adopted for this industry, written and forced through by the General Electric Co., was written in the interest of monopoly, and that if what was true of this code was true of other codes, then it could fairly be said that the codes were being written under N.R.A. to the advantage and in the interest of monopoly.

On November 29 Mr. Richberg replied to that letter in this manner:

> Now, as to the particular question you raise concerning incandescent lamps and the N.E.M.A. code, this situation is one as to which I am very glad to have your criticism and frankly admit that criticism here is well justified. It is unfortunate that one of my assistants wrote the letter of November 21, stating that the independent group of lamp manufacturers could not present a supplemental code because they did not represent a sufficient volume of the manufacture.

On December 5, not quite a week later, Administrator Hugh S. Johnson wrote as follows:

> Replying to yours of November 24 to which Mr. Richberg has already replied in part, this is to inform you that I, too, am dissatisfied with the N.E.M.A. code and intend to open it up. Mr. Richberg has already suggested a method which is perhaps as good as any to start the process.

Mr. President, for the RECORD, let it be recorded that no change has been made in that code; but here was the administrator, here was the chief counsel for N.R.A., last November and December, admitting that it was wrong, admitting that the N.E.M.A. code was a rank injustice, so to speak; but not one thing has been done in all the months and weeks that have elapsed to correct the injustice which, by reason of that code, was fastened upon the backs of the independent manufacturers in the electrical manufacturing field.

The whole policy, the whole winter of experience with N.R.A., culminated by the N.R.A. attitude toward the Darrow report, is but conviction, and to me all the conviction that is needed, that while N.R.A. invites criticism, those who offer criticism should beware, because if their criticism is in any way adverse to N.R.A. or the interests of those who lead in administering the provisions of N.R.A., just as surely as they offer that adverse criticism they will be led out against a stone wall to be shot at sunrise. No one has offered criticism who has not felt, at some stage or other, the displeasure of those in charge of N.R.A.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us what has happened to these small industries?

Mr. NYE. The Senator means in the electrical manufacturing field?

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes.

Mr. NYE. I am told that two or three of them have discontinued or virtually discontinued operations in entirety. The others are struggling along, building hopes from day to day upon the repeated promises that something is going to be done—a something that never yet has been done.

The New York Times has been as good a friend of N.R.A. as there is in this country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did I understand the Senator to say awhile ago that four members of the committee of which Mr. Darrow was the head had been nominated by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NYE. That is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. How many members had the Board?

Mr. NYE. Six members.

Mr. CONNALLY. It seems to me the Senator ought to be very well satisfied with his Board.

Mr. NYE. Has the Senator from Texas heard me offer any criticism of the Board, or express any displeasure over what the Board has done?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; and that is just what the Senator from Texas was reflecting on—how absolutely uniform the views of the Senator from North Dakota and his nominees are.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas is trying to lead me to say that I am concurring in the views expressed by two members of the Board in the so-called "supplemental report", he will be disappointed, because I am not agreeing in any material sense with those findings.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood that Mr. Richberg nominated Mr. Darrow. Will the Senator please tell us about that?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, not one member of the Board who was suggested by myself was appointed with other than the favor of General Johnson, Mr. Richberg, and the President. There was no necessity upon them to name those whom I had recommended; and yet they seemed to be convinced at the time—last February and March—that these men were representative, were honest, were desirous of aiding the cause represented by N.R.A. When, however, their conclusions became critical of some of the things being done under N.R.A., immediately those administering N.R.A. came forth with their hatchets and their axes, with their accusations that those who have offered criticism are anarchists, Communists, and what not—the same old story that has come from reactionaries when confronted with every progressive, liberal, forward step that men have taken down through all the ages of history.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, what I am trying to get at is that first Mr. Johnson and Mr. Richberg went over these names, before the Senator submitted them, as I understand. In other words, they were satisfied with the names which the Senator from North Dakota submitted before he handed them in, as I understand from the Senator's answer.

Mr. NYE. That was at least true in the case of Mr. Darrow, because Mr. Darrow's availability had not occurred to me until he was suggested by Mr. Richberg.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Richberg is Mr. Johnson's right-hand man, as I understand, in this matter.

Mr. NYE. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Was Mr. Johnson aware of the fact that Mr. Richberg had suggested Mr. Darrow's name?

Mr. NYE. Mr. Johnson told Mr. Darrow, in his first conference with Mr. Darrow, that Mr. Darrow was his choice on that board.

Mr. LONG. I see.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the New York Times has been a very decided friend of the N.R.A. program. I think it fair to assume that perhaps the Times reflects what may be a very general attitude toward the position taken by Mr. Johnson, Mr. Richberg, and other administration leaders in receiving the Darrow review report. I am going to insist upon reading that editorial in its entirety. Its title is "Codes and Controversies", and it was published on the morning of Monday, May 21, yesterday morning:

CODES AND CONTROVERSIES

On May 4 the National Recovery Review Board, through its chairman, Mr. Clarence Darrow, laid before the President its first report. By an Executive order of March 7, the Review Board was directed by Mr. Roosevelt to ascertain whether any of the codes were, in practice, monopolistic and oppressive. It was also to recommend changes in any approved code or codes which in the opinion of the Board ought to be made. The President himself appointed the members of the Board, though it is understood that names were submitted to him by various Senators. In pursuance of its duty the Board held hearings and made investigations relating to nine different codes, the chief ones being iron and steel, motion pictures, bituminous coal, and the ice industry. The conclusions reached were, in general, that the codes, instead of restraining monopoly, fostered it, and instead of protecting small dealers and consumers, discriminated against and exploited them.

Why did the President keep back this report from publication for more than 2 weeks? It was evidently not what he wanted or expected. Reversing the precedent of Balaam, Mr. Darrow, summoned to bless the Recovery Act, remained to curse it. Naturally, the President felt that this report contained a good deal of poison and wished not to prescribe it for public reading until he could furnish along with it the antidote. The result is the enormous mass of material, amounting in the total to an estimated 150,000 words, given to the press this morning. It is to be feared, however, that instead of settling the controversy the course pursued will only inflame it. Senator BORAH, for example, who has publicly maintained that oppressive monopolies have been sheltered under the codes, and that the bribe of temporarily suspending the antitrust law should never have been held out to big business in order to persuade it to accept the codes, is certain to be heard from on the nature of the Darrow report and the means made use of to break its force with the public.

The President asked for comment on it by the Recovery Administrator and the Deputy Administrator involved, but he could hardly have looked for or desired the bitter language with which one set of his appointees characterized another. General Johnson describes the report as "superficial, intemperate, and inaccurate", and declares that "this Board is not in good faith." He closed his letter to the President by saying flatly: "I recommend that it be abolished forthwith." A more detailed, but not less vitrolic, analysis of the Darrow report was made by the General Counsel of N.R.A., Mr. Richberg. He made his attack directly personal when he asserted that the main trouble with the report was that it was written by "a noted Socialist who advocates complete Government control of business", and who was trying to please "philosophic anarchists who apparently opposed any Government control of anybody, including criminals."

It is needless to pursue these new and painful controversies. Nor is it possible to weigh the huge and confused body of evidence printed by both sides. But an impartial inference may be drawn by the innocent bystander observing this envenomed quarrel among public officials. It is that the whole business of framing and administering codes has been terribly overdone. When the administration departed from its original intention to establish only a few basic codes, it launched itself upon a sea of troubles. The work undertaken was too vast for any bureaucracy. The obligations assumed could not possibly be discharged. The administrators have necessarily appeared like men—no doubt doing their best, but, even at their best—in wandering mazes lost.

Things have been coming to a pass recalling the intense centralization of all government under the czarist regime, when a man could not build an addition to his house in Vladivostok without getting permission from some underling at St. Petersburg. What has been done, or at least attempted, at Washington in all this matter of the codes illustrates a remark once made by President Wilson, that extreme centralization of government is a "process of death." It makes work too big and complicated for any man or set of men. It produces too high blood pressure in the Federal Government, and constantly threatens it with a cerebral hemorrhage. These, and not merely the vehement disputes between General Johnson and Mr. Darrow, are the real evils to be averted. There is hope in the semiofficial prediction that with the end of the fiscal year the immense volume of unenforced and unenforceable codes will be heavily deflated.

Mr. President, from almost every quarter of this great country of ours today comes word of strikes or threatened strikes. Authorities and students tell us that this summer and fall will witness many demonstrations of protest against the existing order; and why in the world should there not be protest?

When the American people do actually awaken to what N.R.A. has done for a few while doing little or nothing for the many, most assuredly, unless there shall be quick change of policy in N.R.A., there will be trouble the like of which we have not experienced since 1929.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I have been requested by someone to ask the Senator whether it is a fact that there is no code for the anthracite industry, but there is one for the bituminous industry.

Mr. NYE. I understand that to be true.

Mr. LONG. Is there any reason the Senator knows of why a code should have been written for the bituminous industry and not one for the anthracite industry?

Mr. NYE. None other than that perhaps the anthracite industry did not want a code.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, the anthracite industry was pretty well owned by a monopoly anyway, and there was very little competition. Is that about correct?

Mr. NYE. That may have been their line of reasoning in not asking for a code.

Mr. LONG. And in the bituminous industry there were some unfortunates outside the breastworks, and a code was needed in order to get hold of them. That suggestion has been made to me as a reason why, when a monopoly owns the whole thing, they need no code in order to get hold of the balance, but when they do not already have it under themselves, they stretch their beneficent arm, with the Government putting them at the head of it, and take them in, just like tolling young ducks into a chicken house.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas rose.

Mr. NYE. Let me complete my point, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas if he wishes to have me do so.

I have said that it should not be at all surprising if the people of this country should rise up in arms and protest against the existing order. N.R.A. has given great pleasure to a few, and some of the great corporation heads in the United States have rushed into the magazines and into the public print and publicly have declared their allegiance to and keen interest in what the N.R.A. is accomplishing. They should do so.

The New York Post of April 4 last published a very brief and yet a very pointed editorial, as follows:

PROFITS AND WAGES

General Motors report for 1933:
Sales in dollars rose 31 percent.
Net earnings rose 50,000 percent.

I am not misspeaking myself. It says net earnings rose 50,000 percent.

Average annual wage rose three quarters of 1 percent.

From Newark, N.J., under date of May 12, comes a dispatch published in the daily press which I think further reveals why the laboring people, the working people, are displeased with this new deal as personified by N.R.A. Let me read this dispatch. It is as follows:

NEW DEAL HIT BY EMPLOYEES OF N.R.A. HEAD—FACTORY OWNED BY ADMINISTRATOR CUTS PRODUCTION MORE THAN HALF—HOURS CUT, PAY INCREASED, BUT WEEKLY EARNINGS SHOW DECREASE

NEWARK, N.J., May 12.—The new deal does not evoke unanimous cheers among Gen. Hugh S. Johnson's employees in Lea Fabrics, Inc.

The carpet factory of which the N.R.A. (National Recovery Administration) Administrator is president and principal owner has just curtailed production by more than half.

In their enforced leisure the laid-off mechanics of Lea Fabrics, Inc., have been striking a balance sheet of the effects of the National Recovery Act in General Johnson's own factory.

Here are their findings:

Hours of work have been reduced; the hourly wage rate has been increased; the weekly wage has been reduced; unionism is not wanted; the open shop prevails; a union organizer has been discharged; employment continues spotty with speed-ups followed by months of idleness.

The figure showing a drop in weekly wages, as given out by the company's treasurer, were later amended by its general manager, however.

The spotlight has been directed at the labor practices in General Johnson's plant by an article in the current issue of the magazine New Masses. The article charges the company has violated the letter and spirit of the N.R.A.

The balance sheet of the employees is challenged by officials in charge of the company while General Johnson is away administering the N.R.A.

There is no conflict of the 40-hour week. The plant worked its employees 48 hours before the N.R.A. The employees feel, however, that the 40-hour week is a doubtful advantage. It has brought their earnings down during a period when living costs have arisen almost 10 percent.

When the company introduced the 40-hour week it raised the hourly wage rate somewhat, but not enough to pay the mechanics as much as they had been making under the old deal. The employees say weekly wages went down between $3 and $6. The company's figures indicated somewhat smaller cuts.

There is no question but that the company is paying the code wages and above. But the workers point to the $14 a week minimum fixed in the carpet code as "just another one of the N.R.A. jokers." They ask where are the higher wages Johnson has been urging others to pay?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, what is the date of publication of the newspaper from which the Senator was reading an extract?

Mr. NYE. May 12.

Mr. WAGNER. May 12 of this year?

Mr. NYE. Yes; May 12, I understand, 1934.

Mr. President, the most striking thing about the reply to the Darrow report by General Johnson, Counsel Richberg, and the amen chorus of deputies is that the N.R.A. leaders are so unsure of themselves and their institution that they feel forced to reply to criticism with vituperation and vicious personal attacks.

If the facts in this controversy rest with N.R.A., there is no need for denials, accusations, and personalities. If the facts are against N.R.A., all the name-calling in the General's florid vocabulary cannot save it.

For months we have heard, both from General Johnson and his subordinates, that N.R.A. welcomes criticism. This, of course, is an absurd and ridiculous statement. Every critic who has dared to sound a note of warning or to make a suggestion for a change of method or policy has had a torrent of abuse as a reward.

The General has surrounded N.R.A. with an imaginary host of besieging enemies, at whom he sallies forth, assaulting the windmills of sabotage.

Johnson questions the motives and impugns the sincerity of purpose of all critics of N.R.A. In his lexicon all attempts to gain justice for small business become the treasonable activities of base political plotters.

In reply to the Darrow report, one of the chorus men among the deputies goes so far as to suggest an investigation into the mental standing of the Review Board. This classical example of a vitriolic reply to the evidence offered by the Darrow board shows the inspiration, if not the contagion, spread by the general among his subordinates and associates.

Chairman Darrow and his associates were asked to investigate approved codes for evidence of monopolistic tendency or oppression of small industry. These gentlemen investigated a number of codes and reported their findings with evidence of what they believed to be indications of monopolistic practice. As required by the President, they made certain recommendations for the elimination of this condition. General Johnson's answer would have been more dignified and far more convincing had he examined these charges and attempted to refute them by logic rather than rhetoric. The entire procedure awakens the grave suspicion that many of the indictments brought by Darrow are not to be refuted, and that Johnson is simply trying to bluff out a difficult situation by confusing the public with loud language and bitter denunciation.

If this is not the case, why was the Darrow report held up at Johnson's request and not made public until the N.R.A. bureaucracy could grind out a ream of answers?

Why was the Darrow board not accorded the usual courtesy of having its findings made public prior to the reply of the institute it was investigating?

Why was the language of the N.R.A. defenders so intemperate and abusive if the facts themselves denied the Darrow charges?

Why did Mr. Richberg seize upon the supplement to the Darrow report which was signed by only one member besides the chairman, with the astounding declaration that the Review Board was suggesting socialism or communism?

It is somewhat surprising to find Mr. Richberg in the role he plays at the present time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of the last statement of the Senator from North Dakota, I will ask him whether, in his opinion, there are not declarations in the supplemental report of the Review Board—the Darrow Board—to the effect that the hope of the American people lies in the socialization of all industry?

My NYE. I understand there are such declarations there.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I respectfully submit to the Senator that that may be taken as the basis of the allusion by Administrator Johnson to communism and socialism. The Senator is familiar with this language in the Review Board's supplemental report to which I have referred——

Mr. NYE. If I might suggest to the Senator from Arkansas, there is where the error is made. The Senator called it a supplemental Review Board report when it is no anything of the kind. It is a supplemental report, so-called, concurred in by 2 members of the Board; and the other 4 members of the Board never saw it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is entitled "Special and Supplemental Report to the President", by Clarence Darrow, chairman, and William O. Thompson, member of the National Recovery Review Board.

Mr. NYE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In that supplemental report there is this statement:

The choice is between monopoly sustained by government, which is clearly the trend in the National Recovery Administration, and a planned economy, which demands socialized ownership and control, since only by collective ownership can the inevitable conflict of separately owned units for the market be eliminated in favor of planned production. There is no hope for the small business man or for complete recovery in America in enforced restriction upon production for the purpose of maintaining higher prices. The hope for the American people, including the small business man, not to be overwhelmed by their own abundance lies in the planned use of America's resources following socialization. To give the sanction of government to sustain profits is not a planned economy, but a regimented organization for exploitation. The N.R.A. is at present in the stage of conflict of interests; but in proportion as the authority of government sanctions regulation by industrial combinations, the inevitable tendency is toward monopoly, with elimination of the small business.

I respectfully suggest that this supplemental report—which, it is true, is signed only by Mr. Darrow and Mr. Thompson—makes the issue that there is no choice between government ownership or monopoly sustained by government and the complete socialization of all industry.

The complaints of selfish interests that they have not been granted all they have asked, evidence the value of the general policy of the N.R.A.

May I add that the task of the National Recovery Administration has seemed to me from the beginning so great and so difficult as to approach the impossible insofar as satisfying everyone is concerned. We have had complaints from what is commonly termed "big business" that the National Recovery Administration is dominated by organized labor. They criticize and protest the formula for collective bargaining. On the other hand, the American Federation of Labor and other organizations have protested the recognition of the company unions.

It was inevitable that a plan to raise wages, which also contemplated increased prices, would result in hardship to some small businesses, and I do not commit myself to the theory in fact that injustice may not have been done in instances.

Take the case of shaft bituminous coal mines, where wages were raised under the N.R.A. code so as to make it impossible for mines in certain areas to operate except at considerable loss: That has resulted in disadvantage not only to the mine owners but, I think, to those who actually operate the mines, the miners themselves. It is entirely conceivable that similar results may have ensued in the case of other industries.

It is not an easy task to administer a law like the National Recovery Act, and nothing is accomplished by diverting attention from the practical affairs of the administration of the act to academic questions such as communism and socialism. I think the supplemental report referred to furnishes a basis for the retort that is attributed to the Administrator of the National Recovery Act. If as a result of all the criticisms that have been made the administration of the act shall be improved and the fundamental purpose of the measure, namely, the promotion of the general welfare of the people as a whole, shall be accomplished, the act will have vindicated itself.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with the remarks I made a few moments ago, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part thereof, an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of Monday, May 21, 1934, under the title "A Lost Opportunty."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A LOST OPPORTUNITY

In transmitting the National Review Board's report to the President, General Johnson said: "In my judgment this Board has missed a great opportunity for a real public service." His opinion will be shared by all fair-minded men who take the trouble to scan the ex parte evidence, biased criticism, and misstatements that are embodied in the report. The indignation of the N.R.A. officials whose conduct and motives have been assailed is probably tempered by a realization that they have been afforded an excellent opportunity to set up defense by exposing the weakness of the attack. The result is a series of official replies containing much interesting information and more picturesque language. Unfortunately, in the verbal melee the chief purpose of the inquiry is lost to sight.

The National Review Board was established to serve as an impartial forum for determining whether the N.R.A. codes tend to oppress small businesses and encourage monopoly. As suggested by its dissenting member, the Board should have had expert assistance to enable it to digest the mass of existing testimony before proceeding with this immediate task. Instead, it secured a very limited amount of evidence, mostly from prejudiced sources and, without prior preparation, cavalierly announced its decisions upon questions of extraordinary complexity.

Without doubt there are evils connected with price fixing, limitation of output, and other restrictive code practices that call for correction. In some instances small business is penalized and in other cases the larger units suffer. A well-informed, judicially minded group of investigators could have performed a valuable public service by weighing the benefits of code price systems against the evils and indicating the long-time economic effects of present policies.

Instead of making constructive recommendations, however, the report of the Darrow Board shows a lack of coherence that would make its conclusions suspect, even if they were not patently based on inadequate understanding of the problems involved. For example, fair competition is said to be "merely a resounding and illusory phrase." "All competition", says the Board, "is savage, wolfish, and relentless." After reading this statement, it is rather startling to discover that the Board considers a return to the antitrust laws, for the purpose of restoring competition, to be "one of the great needs of the times." In urging this return to "wolfish competition", the Board appears to be singularly indifferent to the fate of the small business unit. Moreover, it is open to a charge of inconsistency for approving regulation of hours and wages under the N.R.A. and asserting that such control is quite compatible with the competitive system.

In the light of these contradictions it becomes difficult to take the report very seriously except on the assumption that it was designed to support Mr. Darrow's plea for a rejection of existing institutions in favor of State socialism. In a special report to the President he says: "The choice is between monopoly sustained by government, which is clearly the trend in the National Recovery Administration, and a planned economy, which demands socialized ownership and control." In short, socialism provides the only solution for the troubles of the small business man, in the opinion of Mr. Darrow. Consequently, he can, without being guilty of inconsistency, simultaneously damn competition and private monopoly, cry out against regulation of the N.R.A. type and call for still more Government regulation.

The only service that the Darrow Board has performed for the N.R.A. is to afford General Johnson good ground for demanding its abolition and to give him and his aides a chance to defend their records against misguided and ignorant assaults.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I shall yield to the Senator from Nebraska, because I know he is anxious to have taken up his joint resolution providing for a constitutional amendment, in order that he may have a reconsideration of the vote whereby it was rejected; but I wonder if he will permit me to complete a point I was in the midst of when interrupted? Upon the completion of that, I think I shall yield the floor, but will give notice of a desire and an intent to have the floor again tomorrow that I may complete the argument which I am sure ought to be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I can but say that the supplemental report is not the report of the Darrow Review Board. I realize that two members of the Board by making that supplemental report have destroyed the effectiveness, in a measure, of the main report, but it is the Darrow report, the findings of monopoly and the encouragement of monopoly by the Review Board and its report to the President with which I am concerned, and with which I want the Congress and the American people to be concerned. Mr. Darrow and Mr. Thompson can answer for themselves as individual spokesmen, as they were, in presenting the so-called "supplemental report." I had said it was somewhat surprising to me to find Mr. Richberg in the role he takes at this time. He is the author of Tents of the Mighty, a book in which he declared:

> When the property rights of the few become destructive of the liberties of the many, these property rights must be modified. * * * Democratic government cannot endure, individual liberty cannot be maintained under laws whereby the political government, in order to protect property rights, must support an autocratic control over the lives of the people and over the development of the physical resources of the Nation by privately selected operators of vast properties.

It would clarify conditions to a great many people if Mr. Richberg, while he is on the subject, would define what type of government we are now living under, considering N.R.A. as typical of that government. Is N.R.A. a socialistic experiment or a Fascist experiment? And, if it is neither of those, what is it?

I hope Mr. Richberg will not tell us that it represents the American ideal as envisioned by those statesmen who drew up the American Constitution, or as envisioned by Franklin D. Roosevelt, who has repeatedly, time and again declared unflagging interest in the welfare of small industries, who has declared himself most emphatically as believing that small industry plays a part in our economic structure that invites encouragement.

The one item that is entirely overlooked in the Johnsonian blare of scorn and defiance is this so-called "little man", in whose behalf the Review Board was created.

Today, as always, the little man stands outside looking in. N.R.A. has refused him admittance and the Review Board's plea in his behalf has been rejected with such violence that the national forum rocks with the verbal thunder of the peevish general. With the support of the administration, small business had some chance—not much perhaps, but some—but with the force of Government supporting monopoly, its cause is lost and hopeless; and unless the President himself takes very drastic measures to prevent it, monopoly can continue to gobble its small competition, secure in the smile of the Government itself.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I now ask, Mr. President, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to reconsider the vote by which Senate Joint Resolution 29 was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the vote by which Senate Joint Resolution 29 was rejected be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. STEIWER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the joint resolution is not now open to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to send an amendment to the desk.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest that the parliamentary situation is not now such that amendments may be offered. The joint resolution has passed its third reading, and the question now is merely on reconsidering the vote by which the joint resolution was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The votes by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time have not been reconsidered. That will have to be done before an amendment may be offered.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I regret that I feel it necessary to address the Senate with respect to the joint resolution, because I know how anxious Senators are to return to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Senate Joint Resolution 29 is, however, a measure of very great importance. Upon the passage of this resolution a number of Senators cast their votes in opposition to it. I was one of that number, and I feel that I am obliged, in fairness to myself and to others who voted as I did, to make some explanation which will point out the objections which we think inhere in this proposal.

The title of the joint resolution implies that it is to provide for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States. This title, Mr. President, in some elections and in some years may truly portray the purpose and the results of the amendment if it shall be written into the Constitution of the United States. However, in other elections in other years this title, in my humble judgment, may become most erroneous. The conditions may be such that the amendment will not produce the popular election of President and Vice President, but will result in the overriding of the popular vote and that it will, in that event, result in something entirely other than the popular election of President and Vice President.

This is true for a number of reasons, but it is true chiefly by reason of the ever present threat that the election will be thrown into the House of Representatives for final determination.

The joint resolution proposes to abolish the electors as they are constituted under existing law; the names of the candidates are to be written upon the ballot, just as they are now under State law in many cases where the names of the candidates are written upon the ballots along with the names of the electors; but under this proposal the names of the candidates are to be written upon the ballots without the names of any electors because the electors are no longer to exist.

In the first instance, therefore, there would be a popular election just as there is a popular election at this time, but when the result has been determined, if it shall develop that no candidate has received a majority of the vote by States, the determination must then be made by the House of Representatives.

This, of course, is true under existing law, and the point that I make would seem to be of little validity, except for one insurmountable element or factor in this equation; that factor is the abolition of the electoral college and the abolishing of the electors themselves will greatly simplify the mode of election and will invite independent candidacies. I think this has not been denied and will not be denied by those who are sponsoring the joint resolution. In fact, one of the arguments made in behalf of the joint resolution has been that it would make it practicable for independent candidates to seek election. All who have examined the resolution have come to the conclusion and will maintain the view that this proposal will make the independent candidacy a very much easier affair.

Independent candidacies are now restrained by certain practical difficulties. They may always be had, but for want of time, and because of the great expense, the necessity of setting up expensive and elaborate machinery in order to provide the electors over a very wide area of a great nation, it becomes almost impossible, ordinarily, for the independent candidacy to be presented to the American people. But this proposal actually invites independent candidates by giving to those who would seek independently election to the Presidency all the facilities which are accorded by State laws and makes it as easy for an independent candidate for the Presidency to have his name presented to the people of the country as it is for an independent candidate for the office of chief executive of a State to have his name written on the State ballot so that he might be voted on by the electors of the State in the State election.

I have no objection to the independent candidacy as such. I am not so wedded to any political party that I object to any independent candidacy per se. In my own State independent candidacies are permitted. In the main they have worked no injury. I think the influence of an independent candidacy in the State election is sometimes helpful and that it tends to make the political parties more responsive to public will.

The peculiar and important feature of the independent candidacy as applied to a national election is that if the independent candidates accept the invitation which is implied in the proposed constitutional amendment, it would not be long until we would have more than one independent candidate in each Presidential election. The inevitable result, as I see it, would be that very soon in each Presidential election we would see upon the ballots the names of nominees of the political parties and in addition to that we would see upon the ballots certain other names of independent candidates who were aspiring to election in the same contest. The result would be that no candidate would receive a majority by which he would be elected under the provisions of the proposed amendment.

A majority election will, in a practical sense, be impossible. Of course, it is not impossible under the literal meaning of the proposed amendment, but in a practical sense it will be impossible. I am greatly disturbed by the fear that in every Presidential election the determination will be taken away from the people and taken to the House of Representatives. In view of the probability that this joint resolution, if put into operation, would result in many elections being thrown into the House of Representatives; careful consideration should be given to the method that would be followed by that body in selecting the President. Under existing constitutional provisions ballots for President would be cast by States, each State having but 1 vote. The pending resolution proposes to perpetuate this provision. This means that Representatives of 25 States, regardless of population or any other consideration, may often select the President and it is conceivable that the Representatives making the selection would represent very small proportions of the total population of the Nation. For illustration, the Representatives of 25 thinly populated States could select the candidate who stands third in the count, and this might be true even though the popular vote were distributed 45 percent for the first candidate, 40 percent for the second candidate, and 15 percent for the third candidate. The illustration is no doubt extreme but it proves that this proposal may defeat rather than effectuate the popular will.

Mr. President, I do not want to be too dogmatic about a matter of this kind. I realize that opinions may differ. Certainly they must differ because the practical operation of the proposal is purely speculative. It has not been tried. We probably know less as to what the ultimate consequence will be than the fathers knew when they created the first electoral college. Because we know so little and must speculate so completely in connection with it, it is hardly becoming for any of us to take a position that is too positive and dogmatic. But I do suggest earnestly to Senators that there is inherent in the situation more than a mere speculative possibility; there is almost a certainly that before the lapse of many elections we will be presented with a situation whereby no candidate will receive a majority vote, and consequently the House of Representatives will elect a President of the United States.

The only restraint upon the House in the consideration of that election is that they shall make the selection from the three highest. If there is a Republican Party candidate and a Democratic Party candidate and, we will say, two independent candidates, the only restraint upon the House is that they shall make the selection from the three having the greatest number of votes. We do not know what the composition of the House may be. We never will know in advance what the condition may be.

Political complications may bring to the House a constituency that is not representative of the popular will in the country. We have no way of knowing and there is no assurance that the House of Representatives, in making its selection from the three highest, will select that candidate who received the greatest number of votes in the popular election. So I say, Mr. President, that the proposal does not contain a guaranty of the popular election of President and Vice President, but under many conceivable sets of conditions it may be translated into a guaranty against the popular selection of President and Vice President.

An extended argument might be made with respect to the matter I am now discussing. I am not disposed, however, for reasons which I have already indicated, to elaborate it further.

I think the very splendid object which is in the mind of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] may be better attained in other ways. I heard his statement made upon the floor of the Senate that the possibility of an independent candidacy will itself be a force for good, that it will tend to compel the political conventions to be alert and careful. I am not attempting to state the matter in the language of the Senator from Nebraska, but I think I truly reflect the idea he was presenting. He said that the possibility of an independent candidate will compel the political conventions to observe with care their responsibility to the country.

In my judgment there is something in this idea, and if that were all there were to the proposal I should very cheerfully and enthusiastically accept the view of its sponsors. But, as I have already stated, I think that is not all there is to it. I think over and above that is the possibility that the public will may be entirely defeated and that political influences which we cannot foresee, which we can but little measure, may defeat completely the will of the people of the country if this constitutional amendment shall be adopted and written into the organic law.

Moreover, in my judgment, there is no assurance that the mere threat of an independent candidate will bring to a political convention that high degree of moral or political responsibility which will insure a result satisfactory to the American people. If we are to judge the future by the past and measure the political conventions of the years to come by the political conventions which have been held in this country within the memory of all of us, we must know that when political forces control a convention such forces become almost insensible to any high sense of political and civic responsibility. If the will of the convention and the politicians in the convention is to take a certain course, it is more than likely that course will be taken.

I feel, therefore, that there is no certainty that the threat of an independent candidacy will mean the purification of the convention system in this country. It might operate that way in some election years, and it might operate in an opposite way in other election years; but whatever the result may be in terms of purification of a convention which nominates candidates for President and Vice President, we do know that independent candidacies will in all likelihood so split the vote that there will be no majority vote and the election will thus be thrown into the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, it seems to me there are better ways of approaching the question of purification of national conventions than by merely holding over those conventions the threat of an independent candidacy. There are more effective ways, there are means which will operate more directly, and those means are within our power. They may be attained by legislative action or they may be attained by constitutional amendment and by identically the same process which is to be resorted to in connection with the pending joint resolution. Let me refer briefly to certain proposals now pending in Congress.

Some days ago I was very much pleased by the action of the Senate in passing Senate bill 1884. This is a bill to prevent the use of Federal official patronage in Presidential nominating conventions, and to prohibit Federal officeholders from misuse of positions of public trust for private and partisan ends. In the House the bill was referred to an appropriate committee, which has already considered the bill, and I believe a favorable report was made to the House this afternoon. The bill would absolutely prohibit, with a penalty, the participation of any Federal-appointed officeholder in a political convention which has for its aim the nomination of candidates for President and for Vice President.

We know the problem, Mr. President. We know the difficulty encountered in almost every Presidential year in obtaining, through the political methods in vogue the kind of action which the American people would approve in the selection of candidates for President and for Vice President.

Let me read some brief excerpts from statements made by a number of very well-informed people.

First, a statement made by Mr. Shouse over the radio June 18, 1932, in which he charged that the Republican convention at Chicago was crowded with Federal officeholders. I do not know the extent to which this charge is true, but we all know that there were very many Federal appointees in that convention. I read what he said merely because it expresses the view point of an able critic. These are his words:

> Considering that over 400 of the 1,154 delegates were Federal officeholders, neither the candidate nor the platform could very well have been expected to show much deviation from the President's ideas.

Mr. President, this criticism made with respect to the Republican convention in 1932 is not unusual. It is not exceptional. A similar criticism has been made against almost every Republican and Democratic convention in the last quarter of a century. There is variation in the number of Federal appointees present in the various conventions. There is, of course, variation in the influence which they exert in the selection of the candidates and the writing of the platform; but I submit that it is only a question of degree. It is only a question of the extent to which these patronage seekers and officeholders may go in their attempt to control the will and to dictate the action of the convention.

Back in 1912 we saw probably the greatest abuse of convention privilege that ever was committed in the history of this country. At that time in the Republican convention there were very many who were officeholders or office seekers, and who were controlled by patronage or by the hope of patronage. Let me read briefly two or three excerpts which deal with that situation. I read from page 9641 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 1912, as follows:

> The activity of Federal officeholders on behalf of the renomination of President Taft has been no secret. They were active everywhere, and used their influence everywhere, but in some localities in the South they completely dominated and controlled the situation. The evil of political control by patronage is not confined alone to the officeholders themselves. Many of the political bosses do not occupy public positions. They get their pay not directly from the Federal Treasury but by the control of appointments; they receive their compensation in thousands of devious ways by the favor extended to them through public officials who hold official positions on account of their recommendation. Political machines could not live over night were it not for the wonderful power of patronage. The use of patronage to bring about the renomination of President Taft was known to all men. Its evils smelled to heaven. I know, the gentleman from Wyoming knows, the Speaker knows, the House knows, the country knows, and God knows that without the power of political patronage the renomination of President Taft at Chicago would have been as impossible as the passing of a camel through a needle's eye.

Mr. President, those words were attributed to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who at that time was conducting a valiant fight against the abuses that had grown up in the national political conventions.

In connection with that convention, and the methods there used, and the personnel that made up the convention, let me add that it was said during the debates in the House of Representatives on the subject that with respect to some of the Southern States the control was almost entirely with officeholders. It was charged with respect to the State of Georgia and its delegation that every white man on the delegation, with the exception of one, was a Federal officeholder, and that the combined annual salaries of the delegates and alternates amounted to $52,000.

It was charged with respect to Alabama that out of the whole delegation of forty-odd delegates and alternates there were only five or six who were not officeholders, and that their combined annual salaries amount to something like $50,000. There was placed in the RECORD a list of the delegates from the State of Mississippi. I shall not read them now, but they sound like the roster of Federal officeholders. That list shows, among others, a United States commissioner, postmaster at Victoria, ex-collector of internal revenue, juror selector, postmaster at Holly Springs, postmaster at Greenville, professional juror, postmaster at Meridian, and various other Federal officeholders, all of whom came into that convention to help thwart the will of the people of the Republican Party, and to deliver the verdict of that convention in accordance with Presidential and other political influence.

Mark Sullivan, in volume IV of Our Times, which covers the period of the 1912 convention, refers to the Federal officeholders in only one place, and that was as follows:

> With Roosevelt's announcement of his candidacy, the comparatively few who had been temperately interested in direct primaries as a cause were now joined by the very many who were ardently interested in Roosevelt as a hero, who desired him to have the Republican nomination who knew that the conventions would be controlled by standpatters and officeholders, and who saw in the Presidential primary Roosevelt's only chance.

William Roscoe Thayer, in his Biography of Roosevelt, which is considered probably the most authentic of many such publications, has this to say (p. 356):

> During the weeks Roosevelt had been deliberating over "throwing his hat into the ring" his opponents had been busily gathering delegates. According to the unholy custom which gave to the Republicans in Southern States a quota of delegates proportioned to the population, and not to the number of Republican voters, a large southern contingent was pledged to Mr. Taft very early. Most of the few southern Republicans were either Federal officeholders or Negroes; the former naturally supported the administration on which their livelihood depended, the latter, whose votes were not counted, also supported the President, from whom alone they might expect favors. The former slave States elected 216 delegates, nearly all of whom went to President Taft.

Mr. President, if time permitted, and the patience of Senators on this subject were not so nearly exhausted, I should like to go down through the history of the conventions. At some subsequent time I may do so, but I shall refrain from doing so at this time. It is written into history over the years that the national political conventions have been attended by delegates and alternates who were Federal officeholders to an extent that varied all the way from 100 up to a figure near 400 out of a total of between eleven and twelve hundred delegates. It is an accepted fact, I take it, that those who control these Federal officeholders need but little other strength in order to control the convention and to nominate the candidate.

I speak on this subject now, Mr. President, because of my interest in the bill presently pending in the House, and because of my belief that this measure will exert an effective power to purify and cleanse the national conventions, to take out of those conventions the office seekers and the officeholders, and to see to it that our own Federal employees shall not go to those conventions to yield to the will of an incumbent administration. The enactment of this bill will permit the people of this country by free action in a free convention to nominate for President and Vice President the real choice of the different parties. After its enactment we will no longer be seriously concerned over the question of final election through an electoral college or by some other means. Party nominations, honestly and fairly made, will do much to make the people the rightful masters of the politicians and will insure a final choice satisfactory to the Nation.

The argument made here with some force that the pending constitutional amendment is necessary in order to bring to the convention a sense of political responsibility will largely disappear when Congress shall have taken appropriate action to keep its own officeholders out of the convention. To me it seems better to make the direct approach. It seems better to make the attempt to purify the conventions by minimizing patronage control than to risk the ever-present possibility of throwing the election of the President into the House of Representatives, where the results may be more harmful than anyone can foresee at this time.

I desire to refer briefly to one other matter and then I shall yield the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. FESS. When this matter was being discussed the other day, I put into the RECORD figures showing the number of contests where the margin was so close that a small change of votes in a single State would have changed the result of the election. If the Senator will take all those cases, he will find that in every case the man who was chosen President was chosen by a plurality vote but failed of a majority vote. In every case, if this amendment had been part of the Constitution, the election would have gone into the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true; but, Mr. President, the Senator is speaking of conditions in the past. When we abolish the electors and invite independent candidacies, we decrease the probability of a majority vote; we increase the probability of a plurality vote and bring about a condition that all of us may rue before very many years have passed.

Mr. FESS. What I wanted the Senator to note was that while under the present Constitution throwing the election of President into the House of Representatives is a rare thing, this amendment in a number of cases in the past would have thrown it into the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEIWER. I think so, Mr. President.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator ever considered the desirability of an amendment which would limit the term of the President to, say, 6 years, and make him ineligible to reelection?

Mr. STEIWER. We all have; but I hope the Senator will not ask me to discuss that question at this time, because we desire to bring this matter to a conclusion.

Mr. FESS. I withdraw the question.

Mr. STEIWER. I will say, however, in further answer to what the Senator from Ohio has said, that I liked this amendment better at the time it was on a 35-percent basis than I do now, when it is on a majority basis. I think the committee acted wisely, and that the view of the Senator from Nebraska was sound in placing it on a 35-percent basis.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That illustrates how impossible it is to get a constitutional amendment or any other measure through by unanimous consent. Why did not the Senator raise his strong voice in favor of that before we amended this bill? That provision went out because nobody defended it. Everybody was against it. It has gone out. Now the Senator opposes the amendment because it did not stay in.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I am not so conceited as to believe that what the Senator characterizes as my "strong voice" would have influenced any votes with respect to that question when the quiet omnipotence of the Senator from Nebraska failed to do so. I sincerely believe, however, that a 35-percent requirement is better than a 50-percent requirement, and that it would constitute a fairly good assurance that the selection would not go to the House, but that under almost every reasonable condition the election would result in the selection of a President of the United States by the people.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to discuss one other matter very briefly, and then I shall conclude.

As I suggested a while ago, there are other ways by which we may approach this very important subject. One of them, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] earlier in the debate, is by an amendment of the Constitution relating to the popular nomination by a direct primary system of candidates for President and Vice President; in other words, a constitutional amendment which would permit the Congress of the United States to provide such a system. To me that is the ultimate solution and the effective solution of this question.

I do not know why, in the face of the record of political conventions in the past in this country, there has not been a more acute and favorable reaction to the idea of the direct primary selection of the nominees for President and Vice President. The idea has been presented to Congress, but, I am afraid, in a half-hearted sort of way. I have talked about it with other Senators, and many others have considered it.

During this session of the Congress I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 79, proposing the appropriate amendment to the Constitution in order that direct primary elections might be held in the various States to nominate candidates for President and Vice President. Pressure of other matters has prevented me from giving the matter the attention it deserved. The Committee on the Judiciary, to which the joint resolution was referred, has not taken it up for consideration, and I assume that at this late day no action will be taken with respect to it. I cannot escape the conclusion, however, that some such amendment as this ought to be vigorously pressed, and that those of us who believe in popular government ought to insist upon action by Congress in submitting this proposal to the people of the United States.

I have felt for a long time that the legislatures would approve such an amendment; that we should set up a system of direct primary elections which would bring about a result satisfactory to the people of our country; that if we should set up such a system we could bring about a satisfactory result. There would be no repetition of the old boss-ridden conventions, and we would have no occasion to be dealing now with a question like the proposal to abolish the presidential electors.

Through this kind of amendment means can be found for bringing the elections closer to the people, and that great object may be achieved without running the risk of upsetting the system, in those cases in which the number of votes obtained by the leading candidate is not sufficient to result in an election, and the final determination goes to the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, this concludes all I care to say at this time. I ask that Senate Joint Resolution 79, to which I have referred, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to popular nominations of candidates for President and Vice President

Resolved, etc., That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislature of three fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to provide a uniform system of primary elections to be held within the several States for the nomination by members of political parties of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President, and to prescribe the manner of holding such elections therein; but the legislatures of the several States shall have power to prescribe the times and places of holding such elections and to prevent fraud and corrupt practices in connection with such elections.

"SEC. 2. This article shall not deprive the several States of power to provide for the manner of making such nominations until the Congress shall have enacted legislation with respect thereto pursuant to this article."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

Mr. DIETERICH. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, when this question was before us yesterday, and my name was called, I voted "nay."

On yesterday morning three committees, two of which I am a member, and another committee before which I had a bill, held meetings. I could not, of course, attend all the committee meetings, but I did attend one.

I came into the Senate Chamber just as my name was being called during the vote on the joint resolution now pending, and I had to have my name passed until I could learn what the question was. I have tried to follow a rule that when I do not know a thing about a matter before the Senate, I vote "nay", and upon that theory, I voted "nay" yesterday.

When a motion is made to reconsider, if one shall be made, I expect to change my vote and to vote "yea", since I now think I know what the question is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with reference to the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

I also wish to announce that the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] is detained from the Senate by illness.

I also announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] are absent in attendance on an important committee meeting.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] is absent on account of illness.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] are necessarily absent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). A pair has been arranged for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and myself with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], and let my vote stand.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

I am advised that if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] were present and voting they would vote "nay" on this question, and that if present and voting the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] would vote "yea."

The roll call resulted—yeas 52, nays 29, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 52, the nays are 29. Two thirds of the Senators present not having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is rejected.

CITIZENSHIP AND NATURALIZATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate concurrent resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 19), which was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the House of Representatives the enrolled bill (H.R. 3673) to amend the law relative to citizenship and naturalization, and for other purposes; that if and when the said bill is returned, the action of the Speaker of the House and of the President of the Senate in signing the said bill be deemed to be rescinded; and that the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reenroll the said bill with the following amendments, viz:

On page 2, line 1, of the House engrossed bill, strike out the following: "and unless the child, in" and insert in lieu thereof a period and the word "In".

On page 2, line 2, of said engrossed bill, after the word "alien" and the comma, insert the following: "the right of citizenship shall not descend unless the child".

THE RIGHT TO PETITION

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, during these days of dust storms, emergency relief, and depression legislation, Members of Congress are besieged with all sorts of appeals for relief from their constituents based on the theory laid down in the first amendment to the Constitution that Congress has no right to make a law to abridge the freedom of petition, on which amendment the Supreme Court commented thus:

> That the right of the people to petition Congress "for a redress of grievances or for anything else connected with the powers or duties of the National Government is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of and guaranteed by the United States."

This amendment prohibits Congress from legislating in such a way as to bar a constituent from appealing to it for redress or relief. But, due to the emergency, it has passed laws distinctly contrary to the spirit and intent of this amendment delegating its duties and powers to the White House. At first it was understood that this power was delegated only temporarily, but since obtaining so much power it seems the White House has changed its mind and wants to make it permanent.

Hence, the White House becomes the only place for our people to take their troubles, for surely Congress has little or nothing to do with them. It votes power and money to the President and he distributes and administers it. For instance, in the last few days Members in Congress from my State have been besieged with appeals for relief due to the recent dust storms and drought. People take their troubles to us on the theory that we have something to say about what they shall have or that we can do something for them. As a matter of fact we can only appeal to the departments and bureaus downtown as humble citizens of our State, asking them if they will not kindly do something for these people.

A month or so ago I took up the matter of drought relief with the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, and was told that the Governor of Minnesota had just been down and told them that by allotting $760,000 for my State the drought situation would be taken care of.

However, the Governor, as relief director for this Administration in Minnesota, had hardly left town when telegrams came in in abundance calling attention to the fact that this was not enough. I am sure the House Members and my colleague had the same trouble. Then we had to wait for further orders from the Governor and departmental chiefs before getting anywhere, all the while as duly elected representatives of the people helpless in the matter, for we had delegated power to handle money and relief to the President, and it is up to him to take care of the situation.

But people have not become educated to all this newfangled legislation, and still think they have a Constitution, duly carried out as our oaths require. They have not learned that they cannot have their cake and eat it too, that they cannot have this so-called "dictatorial, efficient" Government to cope with the emergency and a representative Government where those elected to office have anything to say at the same time.

But the White House appears to relish this situation, for very nonchalantly the President sends Congress a message asking that he be given authority to spend the modest sum of $940,905,000 for relief purposes at his discretion. He says that it is his thought that this sum should be appropriated to him under fairly broad powers because of the fact that no one can determine the exact needs under hard and fixed appropriations headings. In other words, where the Constitution gave the purse strings to the lower House on the theory that they were closer to the people and their needs, the White House now finds that that is an outworn theory and that it shall have the power to disburse money by the billions as it sees fit.

But Congress might consider how that may work out. Arkansas, for instance, with only 7 Members in Congress, has received $10,952,641.08 from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, whereas Minnesota with 9 Members has received only $3,044,698.82. With such fairly broad powers lodged in the White House because of the fact that it does not think that anyone now can tell just what money is needed, contrary to the intent and spirit of the Constitution, it is fairly safe to assume that this money will be used to bolster up the cause of the Democratic Party for the coming fall elections and that Minnesota, with its lone Democratic Representative, has about as much chance to get its fair share of this money, in spite of the worst catastrophe in its history, as it had to get its share of money from the Farm Administration.

The test will be where can it help to elect good Democrats, rather than where are there the worst drought, dust storms or relief needs. And if the Governor cannot gage the needs any better the rest of this year than he has done so far, the President had better look for someone else to administer the money to Minnesota residents, for since he said Minnesota would be satisfied with $760,000 for drought needs, reports indicate thousands of head of livestock have either died or been forced on the market due to lack of feed. From the experience of Members of Congress from my State, we are quite convinced that this new theory of government that the White House should determine the need for money for relief, instead of leaving that matter to Congress, where the Constitution has put it, has not worked out successfully, and that Congress has done wrong by delegating this power to the President even to satisfy the need of an emergency. The emergency has not been lessened by this transfer, but the money has been apportioned by less competent hands than by Members of Congress and more injudiciously and politically, not so much to help the needy as to help the Democratic Party. One can almost feel certain that Thomas Jefferson had just such a situation in mind when he urged adoption of the amendment prohibiting Congress to abridge the right of petition to our citizens.

THE "DOCTORS" VERSUS THE ELEMENTS

Mr. President, Will Rogers calls the attention of the doctors of the new deal to the fact that the drought in the Middle West has done more for farm prices in 30 days than all the patent medicines of the alphabetical series in a year.

In July 1933, when the N.R.A. and the A.A.A. were applied to the country, the Chicago price of wheat was at the top price of $1.15. Nine months later—after the A.A.A., the N.R.A., the P.W.A., the C.W.A., the R.F.C., the F.E.R.A., gold premiums to Europe, wreckage of United States currency had sunk Uncle Sam to the tune of $10,000,000,000 in debt and deficit—the Chicago price of wheat had dropped to 75 cents. The price had fallen 40 cents a bushel, and the farmer was paid in 59-cent dollars at that. We had Dillingered the farmer and Caponed the taxpayer, jimmied the Treasury, and wooden-pistoled the public.

Then came the drought, until the dust clouds from the grain farms rose 10,000 feet and covered the whole eastern half of the United States, even shrouding in haze the Capitol which had squandered billions in useless patent medicines. In 30 days of drought the Chicago price of wheat rose 15 cents a bushel. Drought, wind, and grasshoppers were more effective than the A.A.A., the N.R.A., and all the monkey-shines in debasing the coinage. The wheat crop is cut down 300,000,000 bushels, and threatens to put the A.A.A. into the waste basket, where it belongs. Old Sol has beat Wallace to it.

The Senator from New York, Dr. COPELAND, and the Senator from West Virginia, Dr. HATFIELD, will tell you that many a man has no chance to rise from a sick bed until someone with common sense comes along, gathers up the medicine bottles, and throws them out the window.

Under the A.A.A. the Government slaughtered or gave to packers 6,000,000 hogs, and today the price of hogs and the price of lard are lower than when the A.A.A. started 10 months ago. A hog-cholera epidemic would have been more effective—the doctors will try again.

An amusing incident is told on Secretary Wallace by farmers reading the Wallace Farm Journal. He is engaged in a program to reduce corn acreage 19 percent so as to reduce corn production to domestic requirements. But in his advertising columns Wallace carried information of a wonderful new variety of corn he has brought out after years of scientific breeding. The new Wallace corn is guaranteed to increase the corn yield of an acre by exactly 19 percent. So by planting the Wallace corn the farmer can raise the same corn crop that he raised before, though his acreage has been reduced 19 percent by the A.A.A. If Wallace were logical, he would invent a variety of corn largely cob, that would cut down the yield 50 percent and accomplish double the price result, so producing a greater prosperity than by the A.A.A. Also, cob costs nothing in processing taxes and complies with the Constitution.

In fact, the whole purpose of Dr. Wallace's prescription for reducing production is based on the old bleeding theory of the Dark Ages, when doctors tapped the blood stream to cure all ills, whereby disaster brings prosperity. Drought, flood, famine, pestilence, accomplish the same results as the new deal and cost less in taxes. They carry out the doctrine of an ancient monarch, of whom it is said: "He produced a desert and called it peace." The new deal produces disaster which the doctors call "recovery." Did John Dillinger get the wooden-pistol idea from the "brain trust"? It sounds Tugwellian or "Crack-up" Johnsonian.

A like parody on economic sanity comes to light under the N.R.A. Legal powers of the Federal Government under the National Recovery Act are restricted, of course, to interstate and foreign commerce. That is as far as Congress under the Constitution can lawfully go. But under Brigadier "Crack-up" Johnson the Federal Government assumes to enter local and State commerce to the extent of fixing code prices for barbering, shoe shining, clothes pressing and cleaning. What these local industries have to do with interstate and foreign commerce God knows not—only Johnson knows.

Over in New Jersey, so the press informs us, an old man who pressed a suit for 35 cents, the price at which he commanded customers enough to earn him a fair living, was sentenced to jail because he had violated the Blue Eagle code. He lost his trade and was thrown into jail because of the unlawful interference of the Federal Government in a local business. That old man is entitled to a Federal claim for damages, and I hope the Senators from New Jersey introduce a bill to give him a well-deserved pension.

No wonder that Clarence Darrow and his committee pronounce the N.R.A. a flop and say that it helps make the big fellow bigger and to kill off little business.

The N.R.A. should be repealed and Clarence Darrow should be given a vote of confidence of the Senate. Clarence Darrow today for his brave denunciation is being called by the administration doctors about everything in the dictionary. It reminds me of the calumny heaped upon me when I opposed this "National Ruin Act" at its inception and was called "traitor", "buzzard", "obstructionist", and any other gentle name that they could think of concerning me. When I pointed out to the country that Barney Baruch and his crowd had established 1,800 factories in foreign countries, where cheap labor could be used in making the goods to sell back into this country, and that in order that the selling might be more profitable, Barney's partner, "Hooey" Johnson, was appointed, without the consent of the Senate or any direct representative of the people, unless the President should be so designated, to lift arbitrarily the prices through the so-called "National Racketeers Association" that Barney's goods could more easily come in over the tariff, I was designated, by no less a personage than the Governor of the State of Minnesota, as a guerrilla. I shall ask at the conclusion of my speech to print a letter of mine to the Governor, in which I quote his letter to me designating me, along with 13 courageous Democrats and 18 Republicans, as something outside of the pale of patriotic society.

The N.R.A. was certainly a great scheme to keep the 12,000,000 Americans out of employment, and still serves that end, making it plain that Dr. Wirt's accusations were not unfounded. If that was the purpose of the N.R.A., and no doubt it was, it has succeeded admirably.

The amount of $10,000 to meet the deserving claim for this New Jersey cleaner could well be raised by firing one doctor from the Federal pay roll. If we fire the whole 2,000 of Farley appointees from N.R.A. practice, we would save $4,000,000, which would take care of 40,000 such cases—a far more logical economy than reducing the pensions of disabled veterans.

The logical economic effect of the price-fixing code on cleaning and pressing clothes was well told in a special article in the Washington Times-Herald. Isador Paul is a New York cleaner who built up a large business by reducing the price of cleaning a suit to 39 cents, and thereby developed a patronage that employed many hundreds of people in various Manhattan sections. Then comes along the Blue Eagle code and jumps the price to 70 cents, destroys the business, and subjects the enterprising proprietor to arrest. He had followed the modern business tactics of Henry Ford, Alexander Stewart, and John Wanamaker—reduce the price to reach the thousands.

Says Isador:

> At 39 cents we make a fair profit on a suit or dress. At 49 cents we make a very excellent profit. At the code price, 70 cents, we lose money. At the code price we're finished. There is nothing for us but bankruptcy.

He and his brothers have built up a line of stores on the Ford principle—something of which the witch doctors and Dr. "Crack-down" Johnson have never yet learned. For a month this line of stores tried the Blue Eagle code. Their business dropped 30 percent in that month. Then what happened?

> Our customers during the month we were on the code price bought benzine and gasoline and cleaned their own clothes or just wore them three or four times as long without cleaning. We had to lay off employees by the wholesale, and it was only a matter of time before we would have had to close up altogether.

Think of such a condition in a free country, the Government carrying on its pay roll thousands of theorists and patronage hunters, brainless parasites supported by a bankrupt Treasury, and destroying business at the expense of taxpayers and the unemployed.

Years ago these enterprising shopmen found that the price of getting a suit cleaned was $1.50 to $2.50, and only a few of the well-to-do could afford the luxury. The cleaning business amounted to nothing. Then the price fell to $1, and hundreds of customers came. When the price was cut to 49 cents and even 39 cents, the cleaning business extended to almost everyone and it became a national business valued at $800,000,000, the big share of which went to pay rolls for tens of thousands. When the price code jumped the charge to 70 cents, a store that handled 400 garments a week was cut down to 100 garments a week, with the same overhead cost, and the hands were reduced two thirds and "our losses grew day by day." The business under the N.R.A. has "bankruptcy as the only alternative." The small shops in the poorer sections are being destroyed. Only the shops in the aristocratic sections can survive under the N.R.A., and the ranks of the unemployed are being swelled under the Blue Eagle of political recovery.

Happily, there is another picture. Ford motor works are not under a Blue Eagle or a price code. On Sunday, May 13, the following report was sent out from Dearborn, Mich.:

Ford domestic sales in the first 4 months of 1934 show an expansion of 176 percent.

Ford sales in Canada—for Canada escaped the collapse in purchase power of agriculture which occurred in the United States under new-deal panaceas—are five times as large in 1934 as in 1933.

Ford sales even in South America and the Far East are four times as large in 1934 as in 1933.

Ford sales in the British dominions, which recently showed a budget surplus, are nine times as great in 1934 as in 1933.

In short, the principal evils which now confront national recovery in the United States are those produced by political amateurs and quack doctors, under the wasteful and destructive policies of the alphabetical system by suspension of the laws of the land.

Mounting public debt, with an annual interest charge now approximately $1,000,000,000, which is more than the cost of all Federal Government disbursements during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt.

Mounting taxes checking the expansion of industrial enterprise.

The greatest bureaucracy of useless parasites in world history—and chiefly maintained as party patronage outside of the Civil Service.

Invasion of the rights of the 48 States by a centralized Federal power that has seized control of local industry—despite the guaranties of the Constitution.

A national system of doles now approximating $800,000,000 a month—enough to support the Government a year if economically administered under the terms of the Constitution—a national system which threatens to corrupt the body politic with the false doctrine that Government is a hog trough with equal rights for none and special privileges for all.

The road to real recovery will open when government by the people cleans the way by stump-pulling the dictators and giving the doctors their own patent medicines. Even at that, we have a national debt that will scarcely be lifted before the end of the century, and a Treasury deficit that will outlast the worst deficits of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It is the price we pay for bold experiment with the rules of common sense and common honesty. It is the price we pay for flirting with strange gods and play-boy doctors. It is the price we pay for departing from the Constitution—the way of Washington and Jefferson, the way of Lincoln and the first Roosevelt.

Mr. President, I request that the letter which I wrote to the Governor of Minnesota may be read by the clerk.

There being no objection, the legislative clerk read the letter, as follows:

OCTOBER 4, 1933.

GOVERNOR FLOYD B. OLSON,
St. Paul, Minn.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I am sorry to hear that I misinterpreted your resignation as code administrator of the N.R.A. in the State of Minnesota, for I had hoped you were a man, who, when he was convinced he was wrong or had misplaced his confidence, as any honest man is liable to do, would have the doublefold, real courage to assert it, regardless of where the chips fell.

You say you "believe the plan of the N.R.A. to be workable, but unfortunately the Department of Agriculture has not kept step with General Johnson's department, and its failure to increase the buying power of the farmer has endangered the entire program.

"There are many fine citizens in the United States who believe in the plan and want it to succeed. On the other hand there are a number of political guerillas in this country, some holding high offices, who are attacking the N.R.A. for sinister reasons. I note that you were absent at the time the vote was taken on the National Recovery Act. It is charged in Minnesota that your absence was deliberate so that you might afterward determine which position to take. Of course I would not be so unkind as to charge you with that. I presume that your absence was due to your onerous duties as a member of the Nicaragua Canal committee.

"I doubt that anyone will agree with you that increased tariffs will solve our difficulties. Certainly the Smoot-Hawley tariff, for which you voted and which was pushed through Congress through the efforts of Grundy and your old chum Vare, has been the greatest contributing factor to the present inequality between industry and agriculture.

"The American people are seeking a way out of their difficulties. I am sure that you could render a very valuable contribution to them by taking a definite stand with reference to some plan which would help them."

Governor, you have your facts all twisted. Charitably, I presume you have relied upon some literary confidant to furnish them to you, for I cannot believe you would deliberately misstate.

There is no Nicaragua Canal committee in the Senate. My "chum Vare", as you put it, for whom I fought with all the strength I had to retain in the Senate, was replaced by the Pennsylvania Governor's appointing Mr. Grundy.

You must be a protectionist yourself, because you supported Hoover in 1928 by advising your friends, in a series of speeches over the radio, not to vote for President.

If your literary adviser had looked back into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he would have found that my attacks on the N.R.A. began in May and June and he would have found about 20 pages of my speeches in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to that end. He also would have found that on June 8, the day before the passage of the so-called "N.R.A.", upon which I was paired against with Senator KING, an administration Democrat, that Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, who is the son of Champ Clark, four times Democratic Speaker of the House, offered the following motion to strike the trust chapter, which is the unconstitutional heart of the N.R.A., from the bill:

"Mr. President, I move to strike out title I.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri."

I here quote the record of Senator CLARK, a Democrat, which I wholly endorse, because his words may have more potency because you were a Democrat, and I am informed—though it may be as erroneous as your literary advice concerning my record—that you are contemplating becoming one again:

"Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the bill in its present form again illustrates the new practice in legislation, against which I have heretofore protested, of loading down a meritorious measure with indefensible and totally unconnected matter. There is no logical or reasonable connection on the face of the earth between the meritorious and desirable provisions of title II, for improving the unemployment situation by a public-works program, and the provisions of title I, for the emasculation of the antitrust laws * * * the establishment of an industrial dictatorship, and the requirement that citizens of the United States may be required to obtain a license from some bureaucrat in order to conduct a legitimate business in a free country."

The son of Champ Clark then proceeded for an hour, through pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to denounce the provisions of title I—now known as the "N.R.A."—as a violation of every Democratic principle and platform pledge from Thomas Jefferson down to the very platform of 1932 on which Roosevelt and Garner were elected.

He began with Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, and cited the fountain principles of democracy—the first 10 amendments of the Constitution—the so-called "bill of rights", for which Jefferson and Mason were responsible.

He came down to Bryan and Cleveland, to Champ Clark and Woodrow Wilson, and the antitrust platforms on which they ran. He reviewed the antitrust planks of every Democratic platform in 40 years, the platforms of Bryan, Parker, Wilson, COX, Davis, Gov. Al Smith, Roosevelt, and Garner—all cast into the wastebasket by title I. He proceeded to the stand of former President Theodore Roosevelt and the Progressive Senator La Follette, Sr., and cited the decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

Then the vote was taken on Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK'S motion to strike out title I—the pet provision of the White House—and 13 Democrats voted with 18 Republicans to strike it out, regardless of the party peril to patronage appointments by voting against the White House. The 13 Democrats voting against the "trust" title I were: BAILEY, of North Carolina; BLACK, of Alabama; BYRD, of Virginia; CLARK, of Missouri; CONNALLY, of Texas; DILL, of Washington; GORE, of Oklahoma; LONG, of Louisiana; MCGILL, of Kansas; OVERTON, of Louisiana; RUSSELL, of Georgia; TYDINGS, of Maryland; and SMITH, of South Carolina, Chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee; and GLASS, of Virginia, was paired "yea".

Governor, are all the above Democrats guerrillas?

I was one of the 18 Republicans who voted with 13 Democrats to strike from the Recovery Act title I for the "trust 600"; and Senator BORAH, author of the antimonopoly proviso (now being violated), was paired for the Clark amendment.

The irony of the final vote that day lay in the fact that the vote of 9 Progressive Republicans, hating the "trust" feature of title I, then as today, felt that the only way to get their favorite measure—title II, the La Follette-Costigan public-works chapter—through a Congress controlled by the administration was to vote with the White House. Those 9 votes saved N.R.A. and the imitation Russian Blue Eagle, because our progressives, including Senator LA FOLLETTE himself, were led to believe that this administration would keep its word and put over the public-works program for which they had labored through two sessions.

That they are now disillusioned, but have the courage to say so, is shown by the fact that both Senator La Follette and his brother, Gov. Philip La Follette, though courted by the White House with the same offers of Federal appointments as you are, are vigorously denouncing the entire "brain trust" program, including N.R.A. and the rest.

We have heard from BOB LA FOLLETTE, BORAH, NORRIS, and we shall hear further from the rest of the Progressives, against the betrayal of the country to the trusts.

Was it too much for me to have hoped that you, by your resignation had joined these courageous men?

President Martin, of the American Bar Association, told the association in convention assembled at Grand Rapids, Mich., that the N.R.A. is an invasion of constitutional rights, and threatens the perpetuity of the great charter of American liberty and union.

United States Senator PATRICK A. MCCARRAN, of Nevada—formerly chief justice of the Nevada Supreme Court, and vice president of the American Bar Association, and a Democrat—warned the convention that the N.R.A., and other acts passed at the recent session by White House request, constituted "an avalanche that sweeps away the structures fought for and reared by the great Jefferson and his adherents."

Representative BECK, of Pennsylvania, Assistant Attorney General under President Theodore Roosevelt, and Solicitor General under President Coolidge, told the Maryland Bar Association, at their thirty-eighth annual convention in Atlantic City, that the emergency measures, such as the N.R.A., threatened the overthrow of the Constitution.

United States Senator WILLIAM H. DIETERICH, junior Democratic Senator from Illinois, says that the present N.R.A. regime violates the Constitution.

Fears that the departure from the Constitution may not be temporary were expressed even by the Committee on Administrative Law in the report delivered by its chairman, Louis G. Caldwell, of Washington, D.C.

Former Attorney General Wickersham, Senator Hatfield, Senator Dickinson, Senator Watson, and scores of other public men who are undoubtedly as patriotic as yourself, join the ever-swelling protest.

How about Al Smith, John W. Davis, Jim Reed, Randolph Hearst, Carter Glass? Shall these be classed as not worthy to lace the shoe of your so-termed "fine citizens"? Are they also guerrillas?

Governor, the issue of the hour is to save world democracy, which we failed to do in 1917–18, by bringing the country back to the Constitution.

Italy may prefer Mussolini to a king. Germany may prefer Hitler to an emperor. Russia may prefer Stalin to a czar. But the people of the United States do not prefer a bureaucratic dictator, neither elected by the people nor confirmed by the Senate, to representative government under the Constitution.

You refer to the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act as being the greatest contributing factor to the present inequality between industry and agriculture. Recite to me one instance where the present administration has lowered those schedules. What have you to say about the fact that President Roosevelt recently ordered the tariff schedules investigated and raised where he thought necessary?

There are at least three reasons why increased tariffs are necessary. They are (1) that the present price-lifting program gives importers an advantage over our own producers; (2) it will help to balance our own economics which is practically self-sufficient, and within which is done about 94 percent of the commerce of our Nation, and which, when adjusted, will take care of all of our population; and (3) the present competition in foreign exchange will be directed to the end of gaining advantages in the field of foreign commerce, where we will have no recourse but to raise our tariffs and establish embargoes for the protection of our domestic commerce.

To lend weight to my argument I refer you to the Honorable Raymond Moley for corroboration.

The N.R.A. program has for its object the raising of prices, if possible, to the 1926 level. The A.A.A. program has for its object the raising of farm prices to the average level of 1909–14. On the basis of 100 for the farmer, industry will have about 160; hence, if the N.R.A. were ever to attain success for industry, it would perforce mean the absolute ruin of the farmer. For every dollar he took in he would have to pay about $1.60 for what he had to buy. There can be no parity for the farmer in the two programs, and the success of the N.R.A. would mean his positive extermination from our economic life.

You say that the failure of the farm program has endangered the N.R.A. program. Yes; and I had hoped that this inevitable conclusion was the cause of your resignation, although you have now assured me otherwise. I ask you, Governor, what other possible result can we expect than that the farm program must fail?

To bolster it up, the administration is now engaged in loaning 10 cents a pound on cotton, 75 cents a bushel on wheat, and 50 cents a bushel on corn. It can find no other way to keep farm prices in line with industrial prices. This burden will have to be borne in some form of tax. The Hoover administration bought wheat to help the farmer, which had the same effect. It pegged prices. Then came last year's elections and the promise of a new deal. I ask you, Governor, where is the new deal for the farmer in this remedy? The Democrats have appropriated the remedy of the Republicans for the farmer, and then you ask me to take a stand one way or the other for farm relief.

I can suggest one form of relief for the farmer, and that is lower taxes on real estate; but when I compare the increase in the State levies of Minnesota with the State levies of neighboring States, I am led to believe that you have not yet been converted to that form of farm relief.

In conclusion, I make bold to say that a tariff to protect America for Americans holds a much larger promise for our people, and has much more positive history in favor of this Nation, than has any doctrine of socialization of key industries, communism, or a dictatorship, no matter what its form may be.

I suggest, Governor, that you think over the suggestion of Farm Leader John A. Simpson, who supported Roosevelt as strenuously as yourself, in his recent speech at Chicago, where he dubbed the Frankenstein Roosevelt administration as the "D.B.D.—Drink, Borrow, and Destroy."

Cordially yours,

THOS. D. SCHALL.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD the speech Governor Olson made to the Farmer-

Labor Convention, taken from the Minneapolis Journal for March 28, 1934, which speech laid the foundation for the Farmer-Labor platform, and in which speech the Governor said:

Now, I am frank to say that I am not a liberal. * * * I am what I want to be—I am a radical.

I also ask leave to print the Farmer-Labor platform, which is the purest form of communism this side of Russia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Journal, Mar. 28, 1934]

OLSON LABELS HIMSELF "RADICAL" IN SPEECH BEFORE FARMER-LABOR CONVENTION—SEES FASCISM, NOT COMMUNISM, REAL PERIL FOR AMERICA

(NOTE.—The address of Gov. Floyd B. Olson before the Farmer-Labor Convention in the St. Paul auditorium yesterday follows in full.)

There are a great many things about the office of Governor that are depressing and sometimes annoying, and so, coming before you today as I do, I not only have the inspiration of a great political movement but I have that decided uplifting feeling because of the change between some of the conditions with which we are confronted and the fine spirit which prevails here today. I am not only proud to be one of the leaders of the Farmer-Labor movement in Minnesota but I am honored in the fact that I am speaking under the auspices of a political association conceived in the spirit different from that which has prevailed with reference to political organizations in these United States.

Under the party form or organization, the party committees, to so speak, are appointed by the candidates when they successfully secure their nominations to office under the constitution and by-laws of the Farmer-Labor Association. Delegates and leaders come with a voice of the rank and file. The ordinary organization has its roots growing upward into the candidates. This organization, dedicated to the ideal of aiding people along progressive political principles, has its roots in the rank and file of the people, so that there is no opportunity with an organization of this kind for party bossism or party dictatorship.

Facing today as we do one of the greatest transitional periods of the history of the United States, it should be inspiring to anyone to know that in the State of Minnesota there exists a political movement divorced from the old theory of party politics—a political movement having as its ideal and design a more equitable distribution of the wealth produced by the people of the Nation into the hands of those who produce it, a party devoid of any of the ideas of reward because of political action and without speaking in any sense of harping criticism. I hope it is fortunate that we have such a political movement.

STRANGE POLITICAL ANOMALY OF TODAY

It is fortunate not only I believe for the citizens of this State but it is fortunate because it expresses as an example and something upon which the eyes of the Nation may focus itself. We have a very strange anomaly from a political standpoint in this Nation today. We started out as we were taught at least with the idea that there were two conflicting theories of government; one, the so-called "Hamiltonian", believed in the creation of a strong centralized government, and which incidentally believed the rich, wise, etc., should rule, and whatever benefits resulted from government could gradually get down to the masses.

On the other hand, there was a Jeffersonian theory that the benefits of government should be conferred on those at the bottom of the heap, and in time those benefits would move upward, and that the best kind of government was one decentralized, one in which State rights were predominant.

Today I would say, by way of anomaly, we find the Democratic Party of the United States endeavoring to give out the benefits of Jeffersonian philosophy through the medium of Hamiltonian theories. We find that the desire and the will is to confer benefits from a Jeffersonian standpoint, but we find the procedure, insofar as the centralization of power is concerned and the establishment of bureaucracies, is along Hamiltonian lines; and I am sure that the very distinguished President of the United States, who is himself a Jeffersonian, will fast realize the danger of such a move on the part of the party which he represents and that in course of time the centralization of power in the Federal Government, which is proceeding so rapidly, will be broken up and passed back to the State.

I need but cite one concrete example of that. The States are having difficulty in collecting sufficient taxes with which to meet necessary governmental expenses. Property is unable to continue to bear the burden. Special taxes and forms of taxation must be used, but the Federal Government is gradually encroaching upon the field of special taxation. For example, it is now in the field of taxing gasoline, a form of revenue heretofore left exclusively to the States, and if the Federal Government is to continue along those lines it must be purely in the role and character of a collection agency. It must collect through the medium of high income taxes, through the medium, if you please, of practical confiscatory inheritance taxes, through the medium of other special forms of taxation, and rebate the money back to the States so that the States may use the revenue so received from the Federal Government as a means of replacing taxes upon property.

GREATEST JOB NOW IS THAT OF RELIEF

The greatest job today on the part of government is the administration of relief and in that administration of relief lies the greatest hope under a so-called "capitalistic system" of bringing about cooperative effort. Of course, there are a great many inconsistencies about Congress' attitude with reference to relief.

It was impossible to secure from Congress further funds for the purpose of carrying on the C.W.A. program, but it was comparatively easy to secure a billion dollars from the Congress of the United States to build a new Navy in order to prevent us from going into war when no one, and the appropriation of that billion dollars and the principles involved bring us right back home to our own principles of government, the principle of government ownership, the principle of the cooperative commonwealth, because can anyone deny but what the agencies which are used for the purpose of carrying on war should be entirely within the control of Government; that if government must create vessels and vehicles of destruction, government should build those vessels and vehicles themselves and not leave their building to private-profit enterprise, not create the means which arouse greed and avarice in the hearts of men, and so that greed and avarice will lead those media on to foster and promote wars among mankind, because, can anyone doubt that there is a constantly going on effort on the part of munition factories to promote discord, to bring out dissatisfaction, to bring about dissension among the peoples of the world, and you and I know that if the peoples of the world were organized upon the same principle, upon which we who are here assembled today, are organized, there would be no more fighting among the nations of this world.

WAR IS CURSE OF CAPITALIST SYSTEM

One of the curses, if you please, of the capitalistic system is war, because greed and avarice constantly seeking increased profits, constantly seeking new lands and new peoples to exploit, must needs use the armed force of government for the purpose of carrying out their designs. I say that the Congress of the United States, if it is to be consistent with the principles of the party which is now dominant within those Halls of Congress, must appropriate at least $500,000,000 and preferably more for the purpose of continuing in some form or another the public-employment project which was known as the "C.W.A."

Operating under a so-called "relief plan" will in no sense solve the difficulty and coming back, as I say, to this question which is so closely interwoven with our aspirations and principles, if Government should own the factories and the shipyards and those instrumentalities which are used for the building of instruments of destruction why then, carrying it out further, should not Government own all those industries which have to do with the obtaining of the raw material and the transforming of it into necessary products such as the ownership of the coal mines, ownership of packing plants, such as the ownership of grain elevators, such as the ownership of oil fields, such as the ownership of iron mines.

The blackest pages in the history of the treatment of human beings may be found with reference to any coal field in the United States. We speak of the fuedalism which prevails in some States. Why it is a Y.M.C.A. performance in some other nations of the world compared to the feudal barons of the coal industry in any coal field in the United States owned and operated by private enterprise, and I ask you, speaking as a fellow citizen of a State which owns and yet leases fine iron-ore mines, why should not the State of Minnesota, if you please, operate its own iron mines? You say, "Well, where can they sell the iron ore?" I say the Government of the United States, if it desires to manufacture its own instruments of war, can have its own steel mills and the State of Minnesota can sell iron ore direct to the Government of the United States.

LOOKS FOR UNITED STATES TO OPERATE INDUSTRIES

I am speaking of these things as merely touching upon the ideals of this movement of an ultimate cooperative commonwealth. The Government of the United States in its relief program, I believe, will soon come to the point where it will set up industries to be operated by the unemployed for the purpose of manufacturing articles commonly used by people such as overcoats, shoes, and hand goods and things of that kind, and so we will have, and I predict it will come in the not distant future before the summer is over, if you please, and then we will have the very unusual situation of a capitalistic society being taxed for the purpose of creating cooperative enterprises and, of course, when that occurs it becomes a question of time and a question of the imagination of details and leadership of the American people, as to which system shall ultimately survive. Certainly no one in the light of what has happened in the last few years can defend the so-called "capitalistic system."

Certainly, in the light of what is happening now no one can defend it because the very people who control it and whom the Government of the United States are trying to encompass with regulation to make them more decent are the ones who complain most vigorously about Government regulation. Congress is endeavoring by legislation to tinker with and to patch up the so-called "system", and we agree with their statement that the old order is gone and a new order is here, but I have some doubts about the reforming of the so-called "persons" sought to be reformed.

I am quite a believer in parole and probation, but one who has so conducted himself as to be classed as an habitual criminal cannot safely be trusted with common relationship with society and must consequently be impressed and upon the same principle, a group of financial and industrial overlords who have constantly, by their actions, shown an entire disregard for the welfare of those who helped them produce the wealth which gives them their power, those people who have shown that inclination have no right to be treated as a subject of possible reform.

Now, I am not endeavoring to deliver any philippics at the capitalistic system. Such comments as I make I address to your sense of fairness and logic, and I endeavor to make comparisons more forcefully to show to you just what attitude we, the American people, should take in this matter. The Farmer-Labor Party enters the coming political campaign with prospects for success the brightest in its history. We have withstood the test of fire born of the rank and file. Our party is representative of the rank and file. Our mission is not to make more secure the position of those who rule the economic world but to bring more security and comfort to the masses who create our wealth and receive little of what they create and no thanks for their toil as a reward.

The people know after years of sad experience and bitter disappointments that the servants of trusts, corporations, and big business interests cannot also be the servants of the people.

Never has the Republican Party, both national and local, been quite so low in morale and quite so bankrupt in ideas as it is today. It has stood by like a man dazed, watching the parade go by and not knowing what it is all about. It does not understand our changing world. It is still living in the jungle age that will never return. It is unable to comprehend the change taking place in governmental functions and governmental responsibilities. It does not comprehend the significance of all this because it cannot grasp the modern trend, the force and effect of social and economic forces now in action. What a spectacle it presents! The spirit has left the body and only a faint hope lingers. This hope does not pertain to the present but to the distant future.

The present Republican leaders, if such they may be called, admit it is lost. Even the old lust for battle is gone. In Minnesota we are battling virtually with a corpse, a political party that has not a thing to offer the people. It knows it, and the people know it, too. The faint hope that lies in its breast is tied up with the efficacies of prayer—of prayer that somehow the national R.F.C. (Reconstruction Finance Corporation) program will result in failure and that the Republican Party will ride into power on the miseries of the people.

G.O.P. STRATEGY ONE OF HARPING CRITICISM

One would assume, considering the unfortunate economic plight of the Nation and the Republican record of do nothing in an emergency, when the occasion cried to high heaven for action that they would at least have put their shoulder to the wheel and pushed plans for public welfare, but even this has not been forthcoming. Their strategy has not been to cooperate but to harass through harping criticism.

They believe they are lost unless the R.F.C. fails and acts accordingly. Service to the people is of secondary importance to their own political misfortune but like a drowning man they are grasping at a straw and are lost in any event. Their complete helplessness when an emergency arose will not be soon forgotten. In the campaign we are now entering we can look forward to success for both our State and congressional tickets and I am glad to observe in that great gathering the spirit of harmony and unity that prevail.

One of the worst things that could happen to us would be to fall into the same situation as the old party sometimes fell into. If personal ambition, if patronage desire, if a desire for a place in the sun is to take the place of the old crusading spirit then there is no more justification for our existence. We cannot, my friends, get into that position. This party was founded upon the basis of a crusade and a crusade it must remain. Just the moment that any political movement starts to fall into the fleshpots, so to speak, that marks the end. It will take the people some little time perhaps to find out and to discover that the party or the movement has so fallen but in the course of time the anger and judgment of the people will overtake it. Then we would bring sorrow not only to the fine members of this great crusading movement but we would bring sorrow to all the liberals and progressives and radicals of the United States.

Now, when I speak on the subject of patronage I speak in no sense by way of any left-hand criticism. I know the most severe unemployment situation in the history of the world has resulted in the necessary application of people for any kind of work and so I do not say directly or indirectly that the Farmer-Labor Party has lost any of its crusading spirit. The best evidence it still possesses is your inspired presence here today, but I do ask you to keep in mind that thing which has meant the downfall of party, yes, the downfall of nations, the sinking into a struggle for personal political aggrandizement and that is the sinking into struggle for patronage and preference and I know we are going into this campaign united. Today we are at the peak. Today we represent beyond any challenge and no challenge comes from even the most conservative newspaper organ of the old parties but that we are the dominant political party in the State of Minnesota. That carries with it not only pride but responsibility. We must present a united front both from the standpoint of candidates and standpoint of program. We must all work together.

I for one am committed to the program of having all the candidates of the Farmer-Labor Party running as such under the campaign control of a committee of the Farmer-Labor Association so selected by you but we must bear in mind that by no action of ours shall we rebuff anyone who wishes to assist us in this political movement. We shall not discourage anyone from joining with us in this crusade and this political struggle.

We shall not determine the liberality or progressiveness of any citizen of this State by reason of the fact that he belongs or she belongs or he does not belong or she does not belong to a political organization. In addition to success with reference to the State and congressional elections, we are going to achieve our greatest and most essential success—the control of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota. In order to make people understand and believe and have confidence in our program, we must of necessity enact it into law and we must place the administration of those laws in the hands of people who believe in those principles, who are committed to them, and who have high ideals of public service.

HONEST, EFFICIENT SERVICE IS NEEDED

Because I regard the two outstanding ideals of this political movement as the crusading spirit and as a desire for honest and efficient public service, it is not enough just to pass remedial legislation. It must be effective and efficient administration of the laws already on the statute books of this State. There must be an effective and efficient administration of various departments that have been created for the purpose of promoting the general welfare of the State and that means a high order of public service. Public service not in terms of the public service of the past, because we have been promising the people of this State something better than the public service they have had in the past, and so we cannot be content with merely giving that kind of service to which the people of the State have been used and accustomed in preceding administrations.

We must go beyond that, and so that we must have in mind—and I speak frankly and bluntly—we must have in mind that in the matter of giving positions or offices to members of our political movement that the first consideration must be ability—ability to serve. Because unless you have that you endanger the very program and principles for which you stand.

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota already has achieved the position of leadership in the Nation for advanced legislation which we were able to accomplish in the face of a reactionary senate. We were compelled to call on public opinion to compel support of public measures from reactionaries. When we measure our progressive accomplishments in the light of a majority reactionary opposition, we have a right to say to the voters, We ask your support, if they are concerned with the welfare and happiness of the common man and common woman. Here is a brief résumé of legislative accomplishments:

A satisfactory redistricting measure—a substitute for the gerrymander bill I vetoed in 1931.

An equitable metropolitan sewage disposal law, also a substitute for the special privilege bill vetoed in 1931.

The mortgage moratorium law designed to relieve the distressed farmer and home owner.

The homestead tax law, a measure which lowers the tax levy on small farms and homes.

The oleomargarine tax law which prohibits under penalty of tax the use of foreign oils in the manufacture of all oleomargarine sold in the State.

The statutory income tax, a law that levies a tax on net incomes as a replacement for real-estate taxes.

The chain-store tax, and a bank reorganization act, the creation of a land-use committee, the creation of 13 new State forests, two gasoline tax evasion laws, a compulsory old-age pension law, an appropriation for the continuation of the investigation of the tax dodgers, a liquor-control bill, and the strengthening of the securities law with reference to the sale of stocks and bonds, relief bills passed at the regular session, as well as a $5,000,000 relief bill enacted at the special session.

The economic depression, if such it may be called, had a disastrous effect on the farm and home owner. The situation called for prompt and positive action on the part of government. We could no longer trust the Republican Party just-around-the-corner-prosperity philosophy.

REVIEWS DARK DAYS OF LAST YEAR

By February of last year the foreclosure of farm mortgages had reached alarming proportions. Unrest was brewing in the rural districts of the State. Violence and bloodshed were threatening a desperate people faced with the stark reality of losing their farms and homes. They turned their eyes to the Farmer-Labor administration for relief. The time had arrived for a practical application of the philosophy of human rights, of property rights, which we of the Farmer-Labor Party have advocated since our inception. On February 24 of that year, I issued an executive order restraining the sheriffs of the State of Minnesota from foreclosing farm and real-estate mortgages until May 1. * * *

This was later augmented by a request that the legislature enact a law embodying the principles of the executive order. A draft of the mortgage moratorium bill was submitted to the legislature, and through the fine assistance of the office of the attorney general a bill was finally drawn.

The house, controlled by the liberals, passed the measure with dispatch. The reactionary senate refused to act. Certain senators appeared more concerned with the constitutionality of the bill than with the welfare of Minnesota farmers and home owners. So much opposition was manifested in the senate against the bill I was obliged to bring the measure before the people. Members of the senate hear from the folks back home.

RECALLS VICTORY OF MORATORIUM

Crowds thronged the capitol displaying indignation, and the mortgage moratorium bill was enacted into law. I am, of course, happy to say that the minority of the senate, within whose numbers are included members of our own party and other liberal senators, were constantly endeavoring to bring about a passage of the mortgage-moratorium act.

This law has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been cited throughout the country as an outstanding example of the new order of things. The law of the land now is that the common welfare is paramount, and in a state of economic emergency, supersedes property rights. The Supreme Court decision is significant in that it is a declaration that our laws and our courts must take cognizance of modern progress and the economic needs of the times.

The mortgage moratorium law offers some hope to distressed farmers, hope that by May 1, 1935, the rise of farm commodities will have been restored to a parity with industry and that the people of our farms will be able to pay off at least a part of their mortgages; and now on the subject of paying off, there has been organized in this State in every county a so-called "debt-reduction committee" acting voluntarily and endeavoring to bring about a readjustment between creditor and debtor for the purpose of scaling down the debts of the farmer by agreement with the creditors so that the farmers may be put in a position where his debt is so reduced that he can refinance the entire amount of it through the Federal Credit Administration. I am speaking from the standpoint of the farmers. I ask the people of this State to consider this proposition.

ATTACKS A.A.A. VIEW ON FARM PRICES

Everything the farmer buys is sold to him as the product of an industry that under the N.R.A. is absolutely forbidden to be sold below the cost of production. Everything the farmer buys is bought at a price which is fixed and protected by law and which cannot be below the cost of production. On the other hand, the farmer sells his commodities upon an open market over which he has no control, at prices in many cases below a cost of production.

And so I say to you as I said to the farm conferences at Des Moines, that if the farmers of the United States will concentrate upon one request—not talk about inflation, money control, and all those things—but talk upon one direct question, the fixing of prices and the market place and with reference to that the position of the triple A's is indefensible because agriculture is the basic industry of the United States. It is so admitted, but despite that it is the only industry whose prices of its basic commodities are not protected in the market place. And I said to them, as I say to you, let us not argue and haggle upon parity prices or cost of production or anything else. Let us see and insist that the Federal Government fix a fair price on the basic farm commodities. If it is necessary the Federal Government has already authority to cancel the licensing of processors and handlers of farm commodities and if those processors and handlers will not obey the dictates of the Federal Government, then the Federal Government has ample authority to engage in the processing business on its own accord and under its own direction. After a so-called "fair price" is fixed there may be hearings conducted for the purpose of determining a cost of production plus a reasonable profit price and those hearings may be carried on under the same procedure as the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to railroad rates or the hearings before any tribunal with reference to any public-utility rates.

I do not see how the Secretary of Agriculture or the President of the United States can refuse, in the light of that argument and that comparison, to do that for the basic industry of the United States which the administration has done for all other industries. Of course this is a Federal problem. This cannot be solved by an edict of a Governor. That is but futile.

To my mind it would but injure the people of our own State to embark—it would enable the speculator who now holds large quantities of stored food commodities to profit tremendously. It must be done with the sanction and under the mandate of the Federal Government. I speak of the legislation that has been passed from the standpoint of public service.

WILL ISSUE REPORT OF FARMER-LABOR ACHIEVEMENTS

I should like to speak to you, with your indulgence, about some of the accomplishments of the departments under the Farmer-Labor administration. I, of course, cannot cover all the departments because time does not permit. A full statement will be prepared and generally circulated with reference to the accomplishments of the various departments under Farmer-Labor administration, and an endeavor will be made in there to answer any pertinent questions that might be asked by anyone who wishes to inform himself or herself in order to vote and the answer to which will appear in this so-called "primer."

I think one of the outstanding accomplishments was the passage of the so-called "income tax law." Another important law was the homestead tax law to which I have referred. This measure reduces the taxes on small homes when the value is under $4,000. Taxes will be levied on 20 percent instead of the previous 33⅓ percent. That is to say, by way of explanation, that on a $4,000 home the tax ordinarily levied was on the basis of $1,366 valuation, one third. The basis will now be on a basis of $800 valuation. The difference between 20 percent and 33⅓ percent should reflect, with some readjustments in the tax structure, the difference between the tax on a $4,000 homestead before the passage of the law and the total tax afterward, excluding special assessments.

The chain store was fast replacing the local merchant. It has brought with it underpaid store managers and help, unfair competition, and has effected the removal of capital to the industrial centers of the East. We have continually advocated legislation which would place the independent merchant on the same level as his chain-store competitor. The last legislature enacted into a law a graduated chain-store tax. It is the most drastic law on the statute books of the United States with reference to chain stores.

NO TIME TO WASTE WORDS ON RELIEF

In view of the grave emergency that confronted the people of the State, it was no time to mince words on questions of relief. I believe the Government should assume responsibility to see that no man, woman, or child remains hungry and unclothed as long as there is a dollar left in the public coffers. The question of expenditures is of secondary importance when people are in distress. Despite the opposition and craft technique of the conservative members of the legislature, we were enabled to enact laws to alleviate distress and destitution. The laws passed were as follows: The State board of control was designated as the State welfare body. This is the first time any State department has been given responsibility to provide relief for citizens. Every political subdivision is now charged by State law to support its poor. A two-thirds vote is sufficient legal authority for issuance of relief bonds.

In the cities of Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Duluth a poor tax of 3 mills is assessed on real estate and personal property. The old relief law empowering the executive council to administer relief in case of emergency was included to apply to cases of destitution during a period of economic depression. In addition to that, as you know, there was enacted at the last session of the legislature a bill appropriating $5,000,000 for public relief. That bill will not result in the payment of a single penny of taxes from real estate or personal property in this State. The entire amount will be collected from the proceeds of taxes levied upon beer and whisky.

It seems unfortunate that one must resort to beer and whisky in order to get relief, but that was necessary, I believe, because of the very severe burden already existing upon property in the State of Minnesota. At the time the discussion was had with reference to the $5,000,000 of relief a good many people thought that was a tremendous sum and that the State was embarking upon a tremendous program. Later events have disclosed that it is entirely insufficient, entirely inadequate.

It is estimated, and conservatively so, that if we are to carry out a proper relief program in the State of Minnesota, and the biggest part of public administration today, I repeat, is relief, if we are to carry that on, it will cost between the 1st of April and the 1st of February 1935 about $36,000,000.

HOPES INDIGNATION WILL REACH CONGRESS

We cannot hope in this present day, with the present temper of Congress, to obtain from the Federal Government the difference between what we can raise through State giving and through the giving by local communities to make up the total of $36,000,000.

But I hope that the indignation of the American people over the refusal of Congress to add to the amount appropriated for relief and reemployment as compared to the amount appropriated for the purpose of, potentially at least, destroying people, that that indignation will be so manifest and be felt so strongly by Congress that Congress will be obliged to appropriate at least another billion dollars for the purpose of relief in the United States.

This is a great home-rule State, and yet while we are champions of the home-rule principle, we must recognize that just as in some instances where Federal control must supersede general State control, so in some other instances State control must supersede to some extent, at least, local control of certain functions of government. I speak particularly with reference to relief. When I say Federal superseding I mean, for example, the State is unable to cope in the struggle with large interstate utilities. Federal Government must assist there, and so the local communities, because of the tax-delinquency situation and because of all other considerations, is often unable to cope with relief situations, and I speak particularly of the old-age pension law and the mothers' pension law.

I think that the administration of those laws should be lodged in the State, and I further think that the State should contribute from State funds a part of the cost of the maintenance of old-age and mothers' pension systems. Now, I assure you that I have arrived at that conclusion with reference to a unified relief system after a great deal of study and reflection, having in mind my thorough conversion to the principles of home rule, and I have arrived at this conclusion because of the many discriminations that exist between people who are subject to pension in a so-called "poor county" and people who are subject to pension in a comparatively rich county, all people. All people in the State of Minnesota are entitled to the equal protection of the State, and the State can equally protect them only when the State has some control over the system under which they are to be protected. I further believe that the State itself should build up slowly and gradually a system of health and accident insurance throughout the State of Minnesota so that we may protect the poor and needy from the consequences of privation or consequence of accidents.

PROGRAM EXPRESSES FINEST OF IDEALS

I think that is the most humane part of the program. And we must, you will bear in mind, we must continually go forward in this matter of protecting the citizens of the State. This is not a controversial program. This is a social-service program. This is a program carrying out the finest dictates and finest ideals and mandates of any race of people, and if anyone challenges you upon the subject of health-and-accident insurance for the people of this State you remind them of the fact that there is nothing new or novel about it.

Away back in 1878, the great Bismarck, yielding to the demands of the Socialists of Germany, installed a form of health-and-accident insurance in the great Empire of Germany, and in 1912, Lloyd George, of England, in his budget message to Parliament provided for health-and-accident insurance, and today in that great Nation of England the hardest shelled Tory would stand up and fight if you attempted to change the system of health-and-accident insurance in England; and so, while we talk about being progressive, we sometimes are wrong, because sometimes challenged as particularly radical by some proposal, it is one that the people of the Old World adopted a good many generations ago, and the next step in our social program should be the enactment of an unemployment insurance law.

We attempted that at the last session of the legislature, but met with no success whatever. The principal and only valid objection made was that the imposition of a substantial tax on employers of this State during this period of depression would be unfair, because it would put them at a disadvantage in their interstate business, in their competition with similar enterprises in other States not subjected to such a tax. That condition probably will be removed through the passage of the so-called "Wagner bill", under the terms of which Congress will provide for a tax, perhaps, up to 5 percent on the pay roll of the Nation on all enterprises employing more than 10 people, and it will remit tax, depending upon the kind of unemployment-insurance laws the States have; it will remit the several States the amounts gathered by it as the collecting agency of and for the State.

Certainly a progressive State like Minnesota should be one of the first in the Nation to pass such a law. This is the opportunity, my friends, for the passage of so-called "social legislation."

There is also almost an equal opportunity for the passage of legislation which I may differentiate from social legislation by referring to legislation pertaining to the field of economics, but there is a great opportunity along the lines of social legislation and we certainly should be the pioneers. Minnesota has much more than it had before the Farmer-Labor administration. It had a fine system for helping out in education, for child welfare, and other things, but it needs improvement and forward steps, and we have the opportunity, and we will be charged with the responsibility at the next session of the legislature of the first session, if you please, of the Farmer-Labor Legislature of the State of Minnesota.

SHOULD DO AWAY WITH SUBTERFUGE

And, I think—you will pardon me if I use the term "I" too much—but I think we should do away with all the subterfuge about nonpartisan candidates for the legislature. We all know it is merely a subterfuge. As a matter of fact, all the people in Minnesota know it except perhaps some of the members of the legislature, but they are broken up into groups, call them liberal and conservative, or call them what you will, they are broken up into groups or gangs or whatever term you wish to designate them. There they are, and so I think the first thing in the Farmer-Labor legislature should do is to pass a law providing that candidates for the legislature shall run upon partisan party tickets. Now, threatening you again with a recital of some of the things that have been done with reference to departmental action. Then, after talking about that some few words about some legislation along the economic line, I will take no further indulgences of you. I think the department of this State which is the least talked about but which contributes a great deal to the State is the conservation department.

The conservation department at the time when the Federal Government came in here with erosion camps and C.C.C. (Citizens' Conservation Corps) camps set up what has been described by the Federal Government as a very fine program, and they have worked hard and diligently in that department in cooperation with Federal officials to such an extent that if I may be pardoned perhaps in some boasting, Minnesota's department heads enjoy a very fine standing with the Federal bureau at Washington.

I presume to do that boasting in view of what our chairman told you in way of introduction of me, and I think that the reason—the reason that they are always willing to listen and help us—is because they believe that our programs are founded upon the ideal of giving social service and promoting welfare, and I must stop for a few minutes to tell you about a project which has to do with cooperation with the Federal Government, which is, so to speak, my pet project.

MUST FIND WAY TO SHORTER HOURS

If we are to shorten hours of labor, and we certainly shall, we must find means for recreation for our people. The old order is passed. The new order comes, and there must be recreation, there must be an opportunity for pleasure and joy. There must be opportunities for education, there must be opportunity for people, not only who are children, but adults, to better educate themselves. All those fields are open, and the only thing that bars us is the lack of imagination and the lack of a desire to conceive and build, and so around these great centers of population we must find great areas for recreational purposes. We want to find and create those all over the State.

Down in the valley of the Minnesota River between Mendota and Shakopee is a great, wide, beautiful valley. In that valley wild game abound. There are trout streams. There are spring-fed lakes, great areas upon which forestry reserves may be built, and so we have conceived a project, first, as game refuges, as forestry reserves, as a place for creating a barracks, so to speak, for homeless men, not transient men, homeless men of the State, and for the building up of those barracks of camps in the summer for the children of poor people to be there cared for. This is but the beginning of a large program, taking in the State, which we will carry on through the help of the Federal Government, and the Federal Government is seeking projects of that kind; and the Federal Government, through its representatives, has said to our agents, this is the finest plan of its kind that has come to us from the whole United States. That is what I mean when I talk about the opportunities for social service.

Well, so much for the department of conservation.

I will just pass by in discussing the fact that the highway department of the State—the highway department in the road program also put out by the Federal Bureau of Roads to assist the State—was at various times in the course of the carrying out of that program, first or second in the rapidity with which it set up the projects and got the people to work and at one time—despite the amount we received as compared with the amount received by other States of the Union—one time stood in the second place in the number of people employed upon the public roads of the State. That, indeed, I consider an achievement.

MUCH CONCERNED WITH DROUGHT AREAS

Mind you, second of all the States of the Union, despite the fact that some States had received appropriations four and five times the amount we received. At one time it was second in the whole United States from a standpoint of the number of people actually employed upon the roads.

Well, I would like to go on and tell you about these departments, but I don't want to take all the time on the radio, and I might say, in view of the crusade, so to speak, that many fine people are making with reference to crime, some perhaps with an eye to the political winds, but nevertheless being made, that the bureau of criminal apprehension of Minnesota, which is not a State police because it has no general authority and can only go into a county upon the request of the sheriff of the county—the bureau of criminal apprehension, during the time it has been functioning, has disposed of more than twice as many cases as the bureau has disposed of prior to the Farmer-Labor administration, and, of course, the period during which our predecessors had it was considerably longer than the period during which we have had it.

Now, speaking along the lines of relief again, and I speak of that because of the fact that it takes up the larger part of our administration duties, we are very much concerned about the drought situation out in the western part of the State, and there are some 43 counties in Minnesota claimed as so-called "drought counties", and to the best of our ability and within the limitations of our funds, we are moving livestock feed in as rapidly as possible.

Our main concern now is in the problem of seed; seed, because unless those farmers out there are given seed and given it very rapidly, they will all be upon the relief lists next fall, and they are the kind of people that do not want to be on relief lists. They want to work to raise the food upon which the Nation must live. The conditions over which they have no control, climatic and economic, have conspired together to reduce them to a state of dire distress.

BLAMES SYSTEM FOR CONDITION OF PEOPLE

The Federal Credit Administration has certain rules and regulations, I presume, of necessity under which they make seed loans, but many of them are refused, and so we are confronted with a great problem of seed, and I hope you will pardon me for not being present at your meeting tomorrow because of the fact I am obliged to go to Washington tonight to discuss seed and other relief measures.

Now, all this destitution that confronts us in this Nation certainly must suggest to every thinking man and woman that the system under which we have operated is a poor system; that it is a bad system; that a nation cannot endure, as has been fittingly said, part rich and almost entirely poor. What causes it? Why, the system itself causes the conditions which exist under it, and so every thinking man and woman must know that the system must be changed, and that this very distress and destitution and poverty and suffering is in itself a sufficient indictment of the system in order to convict it, and that we see who represents the radical political movements of the United States.

Now, I am frank to say that I am not a liberal. I enjoy working on a common basis with liberals for their platforms, etc., but I am not a liberal. I am what I want to be—I am a radical. I am a radical in the sense that I want a definite change in the system. I am not satisfied with tinkering; I am not satisfied with patching; I am not satisfied with hanging a laurel wreath upon burglars and thieves and pirates and calling them code authorities or something else. I am not satisfied with that.

I want, however, an orderly, a sane, and a constructive change. I don't want any visionary things any more than the hardest Tory or conservative wants it, but I know the transition can take place and that, of course, it must be gradual. It cannot come overnight, but I want to do all I can, and I am sure you want to do all you can to set it in motion and keep it going steadily, not in jerks or jumps or in spurts, but going steadily ahead; and what is the ultimate we are seeking? Why, I can best express it: the ultimate is a cooperative commonwealth. Now, I do not want to alarm a lot of fine, liberal people, and so I will just to a slight extent at least define that. A cooperative commonwealth may be a commonwealth in which all the industry is carried on by cooperatives. That may be a cooperative commonwealth. A cooperative commonwealth may be a commonwealth in which part of the industries are carried on by cooperative effort and part by the direct control and ownership of the Government. I think Government should operate the means of communication, the means of transportation, the control of power, control of electricity and current and gas and those things, but that Government, of course, cannot go into the grocery business or meat business or anything of that kind.

REAL DANGER IN TORIES, NOT RADICALS

That must be through consumers' cooperatives, but whether you do it through government or you do it through the people; it is the same thing so long as you have a people's government. Now, the danger in this Nation lies not from radicals; the danger to this Nation lies, my friends, in the hearts and minds of the tories.

There is a greater danger of fascism in the United States than there is of communism, and those interests and those people who most strenuously oppose this changing order and this setting up of Government regulation are the people who are the most eager and willing to accept fascism. They want it because just as the history of all dictators and all kings and all monarchs, a powerful group behind always controls the dictator and monarch, and they believe that under a species of facism they can again—I say again—they can again control the Government and control it much easier than they have in the past, because they only have to control a few, while under a suit of democracy they have to control a majority of the parliamentary body in order to have their wishes observed.

When the final clash comes between Americanism and fascism we will find a so-called "red" as the defender of democracy and the superpatriot and captain of industry on the side of mass slavery. Our party has been making steady progress. The eyes of liberals throughout the Nation, yes, throughout the world, are focused upon us. We are the answer to those that contend that a Government cannot truly be representative of common men and common women. If we fail them, we fail humanity, but we cannot fail, not so long as we are worthy of the ideals we profess, and my friends, in this hour of our impending greatest triumph, let us observe ourselves and our accomplishments with humility, not too much cocksureness, not too much pride, but with humility, remembering that we have dedicated ourselves to a crusade that we have made ourselves the agents and servants of people, that we have promised to do or ultimately to lift them up from below, out of the morass of distress, privation, and suffering and that we have consecrated ourselves to a task akin to that of a crusader, and if we do that we will be true not only to our ideals, but to the people who are going to put us in power in the State of Minnesota. Thank you very much.

FARMER-LABOR PLATFORM FOR CAMPAIGN

(NOTE.—Following is the text of the platform of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Association on which candidates of the party will run this year:)

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota recognizes that the United States has the most wonderful resources, great factories, machinery of production; steam power and electric power, and millions of capable workers and farmers ready and able to produce food, clothing, and shelter in great abundance for all. At this time when all of us could live in prosperity and happiness we find that there are millions of working men and women in poverty, want, and degradation, and that there are also hundreds of thousands of farmers, business, and professional people who have become povery-stricken and bankrupt, and millions of people in all walks of life are compelled to eat the bread of charity. Palliative measures will continue to fail. Only a complete reorganization of our social structure into a cooperative commonwealth will bring economic security and prevent a prolonged period of further suffering among the people.

We therefore declare that capitalism has failed, and immediate steps must be taken by the people to abolish capitalism in a peaceful and lawful manner and that a new, sane, and just society must be established; a system where all the natural resources, machinery of production, transportation, and communication shall be owned by the Government and operated democratically for the benefit of all the people and not for the benefit of the few.

In order to bring about this cooperative commonwealth and also for the purpose of adopting legislation for the immediate relief of the people, the Farmer-Labor Party adopts as its platform the following proposals:

AGRICULTURE

Adequate legislation to insure security of tenure on the land for those who farm it. To this end we further demand that Congress pass the Frazier bill for refinancing agricultural loans, and the Swank-Thomas bill or other legislation to give agriculture a price based upon the cost of production.

Exemption from taxation of homesteads in the city and on the farms to the value of $4,000.

Legislation extending the present moratorium 2 years from the date of expiration and that no action may be brought within the 2 years on any obligation secured by a mortgage.

MARKETING

The greatest problem of the farmer being to find markets for their products, we advocate building and maintaining adequate cooperative marketing and purchasing agencies in all the large industrial centers of the State, to be correlated by some State-supervised central head.

INDUSTRIAL PROGRAM

To protect our citizens from exploitation through industrial profits, we demand public ownership of all mines, water power, transportation, and communication, banks, packing plants, factories, and all public utilities. Provided, that this shall not apply to bona fide cooperatively owned and operated enterprises.

Until we attain nationalization of banking, we advocate the establishment of a central State bank of deposit to be wholly owned by the State of Minnesota.

That the bank act as the fiscal agent for the State in all matters.

That it be the only legal depository in Minnesota for State funds or the funds of any subdivision of the State.

That it be permitted to purchase the securities of the United States Government, the State of Minnesota, and other securities designated by law.

That it be permitted to loan money to correspondent State banks and deposit money with correspondent State banks, and that it not be permitted to loan money to private enterprises.

That the deposits or loans to the Minnesota State banks be a preferred claim.

And that the deposits in the bank of Minnesota be guaranteed by the State.

The issue of money is a governmental function, and all money should be issued directly by the Government and made a legal tender in payment of all debts.

All money permitted by law to be issued against the gold now in the United States Treasury should be put in circulation by the payment of all Government bonds due, or soon to become due, and for all public works constructed.

We declare our opposition to issuance of interest-bearing bonds by the Government.

MUNITIONS

We demand passage of the resolution now before the United States Senate calling for investigation of the munitions industry, and we demand that the Government take over such plants and operate them.

We pledge the people to submit an amendment to the constitution to permit establishment of the Ontario system of power development in the State. We also pledge our farm population and electric consumers that we will permit municipally owned power plants to sell power freely outside their limits.

The immediate passage of a Minnesota reconstruction act with full power to regulate hours and wages and carry on useful public projects.

EMPLOYMENT

The State to take over sufficient idle industrial plants to furnish employment for idle citizens and to distribute the products to the needy.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

That all insurance including workmen's compensation, unemployment, accident, sickness, maternity, old-age pension, fire, cyclone, hail, and life insurance be taken over by the State and operated without profit.

CONSERVATION

An intelligent and comprehensive plan for the conservation of the natural moisture of the State with arrangements made to retain the greatest possible benefits of the snow and rainfall of the State and restoration as far as practicable of the lake and river levels, and the encouragement of similar projects in the adjacent States. Also that State lands containing peat be withdrawn from sale.

REFORESTATION

Reforestation to restore and protect the timber wealth and to prevent and retard erosion.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Ratification of the treaty with Canada affecting the construction of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes Waterway.

EDUCATION

Fullest educational opportunities for all, with security of tenure and freedom of expression to teachers. Textbooks to be published by the State and free to all the students. Military training at all educational institutions supported wholly or in part by State funds to be optional.

TAXATION

Restoration of unearned wealth to the community and State by graduated taxes effectively administered on large incomes, gifts, and inheritances.

SOLDIERS' BONUS

Immediate payment of the soldiers' bonus by Treasury notes, and repeal of the National Economy Act.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

We oppose the issuance of tax-exempt securities.

ELECTIONS

All candidates for the State legislature to be elected with party designation.

CONSUMERS' COOPERATIVES

The powers of Government to allow consumers to freely organize on a cooperative basis, unrestricted by discriminatory laws.

MONEY AND BANKING

Nationalization of banking with Government monopoly of money and credit operated without profit.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to enable the President to reduce tariffs. The reduction of tariffs will in many cases cause the virtual closing down of important industries and will throw thousands of American citizens out of their jobs. The task of arriving at a rate of duty on foreign products which may be considered fair and yet offer a reasonable degree of protection is an important one. Before reducing tariffs we should take into consideration a number of complex factors which enter into the production of commodities which must compete with foreign countries. These include wage scales, productive power of the individual, cost of raw material, taxes, and general overhead costs. The wage scales of workers in the United States have long been several hundred percent in excess of those pursuing the same trades in foreign countries. When we consider living conditions in this country, it is impossible to understand the logic by which our Washington professors expect to revive trade by lowering tariffs. The British, Japanese, and French are not more efficient than Americans. The reason they can pour their products into this country is that their raw materials cost less by virtue of cheap labor, and the actual processing of these materials costs less by virtue of unconscionable working conditions and low living standards.

One point which I have discussed in connection with levying rates of duties on foreign products is the cost of taxes and general overhead resulting from internal conditions which must be directly reflected in the prices of commodities which compete with goods from foreign countries. In discussing a tariff bill we cannot lose sight of these conditions and the resulting burden which our farmers and manufacturers must bear in the form of taxes.

On March 31 of this year 20,616,000 adults were receiving monthly pay from Federal, State, or local governments. Strangely enough, this number is almost as great as the number of persons who are gainfully employed in productive agriculture and industry in the United States. Thus we would have for every person in the United States gainfully employed in productive pursuits another person supported from the public pay roll. The following table lists the number of persons supported wholly or in part from the public coffers on March 31 of this year:

Federal emergency relief pay roll	11,115,120
Local relief pay rolls	1,500,000
Civilian Conservation Corps	300,000
Federal employees	892,126
Insane institutions	290,000
Prisoners	224,000
Federal hospital population	33,000
State, city, and county employees	3,962,500
Directly and indirectly on public construction	1,300,000

This list does not include pensioners of States, cities, and local governments; persons receiving retired pay; privately contributed charities; or schools or institutions in which part or all of the population are minors. These exceed 1,000,000.

By far the greater proportion of money paid to these 20,000,000 people is furnished by the manufacturing regions of the United States, and it is the worker in these regions who must produce commodities for competition with foreign countries. We cannot place heavy tax burdens on particular sections of the country and at the same time expect these sections to bear the brunt of foreign competition.

During this administration billions of dollars have been doled out to the States by bureaus of the Federal Government, and must be returned to the creditors of the Federal Treasury by money derived from taxation. It is a significant fact that many States of the Union are actually receiving in cash from the Federal Government many times the amount of money which those States pay in the form of taxes.

The State of Wyoming, for example, is getting from the Federal Government, in cash, more than 20 times as much as all the people in that State pay in the form of Federal taxes. This State gets about 500 times as much money per capita from the Treasury out of every dollar paid in taxes, as does the State of New York. The rapid centralization of power in the Federal Government and the policy of Federal initiative in public and semipublic projects is rapidly taking away from the local government the responsibility for the expenditure of public funds. The net result has been to place upon industrial States most of the burden of taxation.

The shift of tax responsibility from the local to the National Government is building up the power of centralized bureaus and commissions dominated by a virtual dictatorship. The right of local self-government is being whittled away, and those communities which are dependent upon industrial pursuits for the support of the body politic are finding themselves unable to formulate balanced fiscal programs. The load they are forced to carry as the result of the whole national program is so great that it must be reflected in the ability of the products of these communities to compete with those of foreign countries.

While the number of persons directly or indirectly supported from the Public Treasury is in excess of 20,000,000 for the whole United States, the proportionate number in a State like Rhode Island is considerably smaller. On March 31 of this year 60,451 adults were supported wholly or in part by taxation in the State of Rhode Island. This figure is not complete, but it is sufficiently accurate to demonstrate the relative proportion of the cost of the whole national program which this State, and others of like nature, must bear. The figure of 60,451 does not take into consideration persons directly or indirectly employed on public construction projects, nor does it take into consideration pensioners or retired persons on either city or State pay rolls. If these were taken into consideration, we would undoubtedly find the number considerably enlarged. This would mean that out of a population of 687,000, in excess of 240,000 are supported by the Public Treasury, a figure which is significant enough, but which is relatively small in proportion to the United States as a whole.

With an average family of 4 persons, we find not less than 240,000 persons dependent upon the public coffers for all or part of their livelihood. People in the State of Rhode Island receiving aid from the public pay roll are, numerically, as follows:

United States pay roll	16,884
Local public employees	17,999
State employees	2,700
Veterans	5,365
Adults in tax-supported institutions	9,722
Local relief	7,781

Thus we find the industrial State of Rhode Island bearing a tax responsibility for the whole or partial support of not only 60,000 adults within its own borders, but as well for an unjust portion of the cost of maintaining the public pay rolls in States where the proportion of public-supported people is much larger. In an industrial State it is quite obvious that much of the cost of exorbitant taxes must be absorbed by the commodities produced in the area paying these taxes.

Since this tariff bill is but a part of the top-heavy bureaucracy thrown together by the new powers in Washington, I presume it is useless to discuss it on merit alone. There probably will be a new commission added to the hundreds of others created by the administration. The extent to which these commissions have been established is appalling. In the face of President Roosevelt's declaration of a policy of economy and the subsequent dismissal of thousands of officeholders, the Democratic patronage machine has increased the number of employees of the Federal Government by 60,000 in the past 12 months. A few of the bureaus and commissions in Washington designated by alphabetical symbols are: A.A.A., C.C.C., F.E.R.A., N.E.C., P.W.A., T.V.A., H.O.L.C., F.A.C.A., E.H.C., R.F.C., F.C.A., C.W.A., F.S.A.C., N.L.B., C.S.B., N.R.A.B., F.B.O.H., F.O.I.C., S.H.A., F.P.A., N.C.B., E.H.F.A., S.A.B., F.C.O.T., F.H.L.B. I have not the slightest idea what the duties of all these Commissions and Bureaus are. They are working independently of each other, and in many cases have policies in contradiction to those of other divisions of the Government. There is no reasonable coordination, and no evidence of any regard for constitutional guidance.

It will be useless to oppose this tariff bill on the ground of unconstitutionality, because there is no such thing as a regard for the Constitution in the new deal. Section 8 of article I of the first draft of the Constitution of the United States said:

> The Congress shall have Power to Lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defense of the United States.

It was the intent of the authors of this document to place a strict safeguard around the expenditure of public funds, but during a thoughtless moment the authors unwittingly added the words " and general Welfare of the United States." The addition of this language in the final draft of the Constitution was for the evident purpose of limiting the manner in which public funds could be expended rather than enlarging upon the methods. During the past 2 years all constitutional regard for the manner in which public expenditures shall be made has been discarded.

Article I, section 9, clause 7, states:

> No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

This clause is not specific enough to limit the superior evasive craftsmanship of the " brain trusters." They are setting up corporations to which the Congress appropriates huge sums of money to be expended on the sole authority of the officers of these corporations. The establishment of the corporations is presumed to be in the interest of the public welfare, and at this point constitutional safeguards cease. We find the Government entering into all sorts of business and using the public funds for that purpose.

The framers of the Constitution would certainly turn over in their graves if they could witness the spectacle of our Government establishing and operating the only pure communism on the face of the earth, with the full sanction of the document which they framed as a sacred safeguard of a democracy. I am referring to the unprecedented creation of the Virgin Islands Corporation, which, in my opinion, merits discussion as a shining example of the program of which this tariff bill is a part.

President Wilson purchased the Virgin Islands from Denmark for $25,000,000 in cash, after negotiations to sell them to the United States for only $1,000,000 had failed several years before. Since the purchase of these islands, we have invested nearly $10,000,000 additional. As the Virgin Islands are some distance away from the continental United States, some officials have seized upon them as an opportunity to establish an experimental communism; and when they have completed their task the United States will have financed and will be operating the only pure communism on the face of the earth today. It is being brought about in the following manner:

The Congress appropriated several billion dollars to the Public Works Administration. The P.W.A. is lending to a corporation known as the " Virigin Islands Corporation " approximately $1,400,000 to be used, first, for the purchase of all available sugar lands in the Virgin Islands, the ownership to be wholly in the name of the corporation; second, to buy up all sugar refineries on the islands and to maintain a monopoly in the refinement of sugar; third, to build rum distilleries, engage in the manufacture of rum, and maintain a complete monopoly therein.

Officers of the corporation will be officers of the new deal, and they will have a complete ownership of all industry and all land as well as a monopoly on industry and agriculture. The profits earned by the Corporation will be used for the welfare of the people of the islands.

Thus, the United States Government will not only engage in the business of growing cane, refining sugar, manufacturing rum, constructing and operating a hotel, but it will at the same time be administering a communistic government for and in behalf of its own citizens. I wonder if this is to be a model of what the " brain trusters " expect to make out of the United States when they have completed the work of " evolutionizing " the Government.

I recall that when Roger Q. Mills, a Senator from the State of Texas, was visiting in the State of Rhode Island, he stood before a mill building some 200 feet long. He turned to my father and said, " That building contains a lot of machinery which may be rendered worthless by a whim of Congress."

We should not adopt legislation without full knowledge of its import. I believe that when people are hungry and cannot find work we must find a way to provide food and jobs for them. I feel that we are right in enacting legislation to correct the evils of economic distress. Many of the principles upon which the National Recovery Administration is founded are desirable, but in many cases the administration of that act is working a hardship on business.

Let us undertake everything necessary to help the needy and to guarantee to the workingman a fair portion of the fruits of his labor, but in doing so we should not enact legislation so drastic that it imperils the whole structure of our economic system. In these days we must adopt new methods for correcting old evils; but let us stand on solid ground, and move with reasonable caution in doing so.

I realize that this bill will probably be logrolled into law. These are strange days and strange things are happening. Practicality is replaced by theories; industrialists are bowing to professors; farmers are learning to skip their rows and collect from the rest of the people for that which they fail to plant; many are finding that it is easier to receive a Government check than it is to work and produce the necessities of life. Just where this will lead us I hesitate to predict, but I do maintain that we should temper our whole program with reasonable conservatism. Just how many Members of the Senate are voting for this type of legislation with full belief that it is undesirable? I do not see how any Democrat, after voting for this bill, can with a clear conscience attend another Jeffersonian dinner.

TUESDAY, MAY 22, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who hast lighted life and death, earth and heaven, and art the lamp of all, we breathe again Thy holy name in prayer. We thank Thee that Thy arms are as encircling walls amid the problems and perplexities of life. May we trust Thy Fatherhood, in whom there is all the freshness and richness of wisdom and mercy. O bathe the very depths of our souls and make radiant any dark passageways of experience. This day sustain and support us with the abundance of Thy evergrowing power, leading and teaching us and shedding Thy presence upon our pathway. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BREWSTER v. UTTERBACK

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, reported a resolution in respect to the contested-election case of Ralph O. Brewster v. John G. Utterback, for a seat in Congress, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

FINANCIAL LIBERTY—DEPRESSION'S CURE

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by the Honorable BRONSON CUTTING, a Senator from the State of New Mexico, Saturday last, before the People's Lobby in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, on Saturday, May 19, I had the pleasure of listening to an admirable radio address delivered by Senator BRONSON CUTTING, of New Mexico, before the People's Lobby here in Washington. In my opinion, Senator CUTTING has presented a plan for financial freedom which would cure the depression in very short order and as I believe every American citizen should know the truth about conditions in order to act intelligently, I take great pleasure in incorporating in my remarks the address of Senator CUTTING, discussing the existing financial system and presenting a plan which, I believe, if adopted, would be the Magna Carta of our economic liberty.

It is my opinion that if the Government, under the Cutting plan, divorced itself from the uses and practices of the bankers today and extended Government credit at cost to the borrower, the increased profits to the American public would stimulate business and restore confidence, the unemployment problem would soon pass into history, and an era of prosperity as yet undreamed would unfold itself to the American people.

The address is as follows:

For a year or more we have been engaged in currency manipulation. We have juggled with the currency, and we shall no doubt continue to do so. The results have been small. The depression is still with us, and it is doubtful if we can cope with it by any such methods.

The reason is that only a small part of our monetary system consists of currency. Much the greater part is made out of bank credit. Until the Government takes control of this most vital part of our financial system it is not going to break loose from the burden of debt which is weighing down the Government, as well as the private citizen, of the Nation.

Most people think of banking as a terribly complicated subject, a subject which they cannot even attempt to understand. Of course it is complicated in its details, but it has been part of the bankers' conspiracy to confuse the public by a discussion of the details so that they may lose sight of the main outlines. Those outlines are very simple, and they vitally concern the life and happiness of every human being in the civilized world.

Since from 90 to 95 percent of our money is made up of bank deposits, it is important to understand just what these bank deposits are. Of course part of them, the smaller part, comes from the bank's customers, who deposit cash or checks for safe-keeping with the bank. But by far the greater part of these deposits are not deposits at all, in the real sense of the word. They come from the right given to a bank to loan 10 times, or 20 times, as the case may be, the amount of its reserves.

When you borrow a thousand dollars from an individual, he parts with his money before you get it. When you go into a bank and borrow a thousand dollars, what happens? Of course the bank may give you the $1,000 over the counter. But that seldom is the case. Usually you are satisfied by having the bank place the $1,000 to your account. In that case, the bank writes your name at the top of a column in its book as having made a deposit of a thousand dollars. The $1,000 is not transferred from any other account. It is made out of thin air. To that extent it increases the total amount of money in existence. To that extent it raises the price level, and changes the value of the money in the country. Yet the Constitution of the United States provides that "The Congress shall have power to coin money, and regulate the value thereof." In practice the Congress regulates the value of only a small fraction of the total amount of money in the country. The rest is regulated by the bankers. We are so used to this kind of transaction that we seldom stop even to question it. We allow the bankers to inflate our money each time they make a loan, and to deflate it each time the loan is called.

And then there is another very important feature connected with this loan of a thousand dollars. When you get it you generally have to deposit with the bank collateral security of double the value of the loan. If you have a $2,000 house you will probably be obliged to mortgage it for the privilege of obtaining $1,000, and, mark, you, of paying interest when the loan falls due. Yet the only piece of real value which has entered into the transaction is the value which you, yourself, have put into it, your house and lot, or your Liberty bonds, as the case may be. You are paying tribute to a private institution for the right to use your own credit. Your credit depends on your property, which really means your ability to deliver goods of service as required. The bank has contributed nothing but pen, ink, and paper, plus a risk of defrauding its bona fide depositors. Yet, in order to use your own credit, you are forced to pay interest to a nonproductive agency. The bank has actually lent you your own credit, and made you pay for getting it.

How can such a system be justified? It can be explained historically, but not defended on grounds of either ethics or public policy. The modern bankers are the successors of the medieval goldsmiths, who used to accept deposits of gold and jewels from their clients, and issue credit which would be honored by goldsmiths elsewhere. As a matter of practice it was found that less than one tenth of the deposits would ever be claimed at one time, and so the goldsmiths fell into the habit of loaning credit to 10 times the amount of their deposits. It was essentially a dishonest proceeding. Yet people got used to it, and it had no very serious effects until modern times, when the issuance of loan credit of this sort has completely outshadowed the primary duty of the State to issue money, and control its value.

Sometimes it is easier to show up a fallacy of this sort by reducing it to its simplest terms. Let us suppose that three men are shipwrecked on a desert island. There are enough natural resources on the island to provide food, clothing, and shelter for all three, provided each one works at one of the three tasks. The three men might decide to go socialistic, and own the island in common. We shall assume, however, that they find it more convenient to let one man own the timber, one the food crops, and one the sources of clothing.

Then, in order to exchange their goods, they will probably issue some form of scrip to enable them to barter. Let us suppose that the possessions of the three are approximately equal. Each one will then receive the same number of units of value, say a hundred tokens apiece. If they choose, they may call them a hundred dollars.

Now, this scrip really means something. It means the respective ability of each one to deliver a quantity of goods, produced and improved by his own labor. The wants of these men are simple. They manage to live. In course of time they improve their properties, and are able to live more luxuriously, with the expenditure of less individual labor. If it seems convenient to all of them they can issue as much more scrip as is needed to take care of the increased value of their production.

Now, let us suppose that after a few years of this, a stranger is shipwrecked on the shore of this island. He approaches the three men, and says, "Your economic system is preposterous. Your money is unsound. I come from a civilized country. I am a banker. Bankers know that a sound currency can be based only on a gold standard. I saved from my shipwreck three $10 gold pieces. Under the law of a civilized country I am allowed to lend $300 on that basis—or $600 if I belong to the Federal Reserve System. I shall be glad to lend you my credit if you will mortgage your holdings to double the amount.

Now, manifestly, if the three original settlers are sane, they will reject this offer. But let us suppose that they have been touched by the tropical sun and fall for the banker's proposal, which you know will not be couched in such simple language but will contain a great deal of technical talk about discount rates and the balancing of the budget. The settlers go in debt for the $300 and promise to pay interest on it. The banker does a little bookkeeping and lends them their own credit. Of course, he keeps the $30 in gold.

Now, suppose that the settler who owns the timber decides to install a sawmill. He will need help from his neighbors and will have to pay them for it. The banker decides that he will consider himself a member of the Federal Reserve, and extends the settler an additional loan of $200. A hurricane comes along. The banker at once grows timid. He calls half of his loans and renews the other half. The owner of the timber is completely ruined. The other two have to pay in produce twice the amount of their original loans on account of the deflation caused by the banker's call. At the end of another year they, too, find themselves unable to pay. The mortgages are foreclosed and the banker retains the original $30 in gold, and, in addition, the entire tangible assets of the community.

Now, of course, this seems childish and silly when you are dealing with four people on a desert island. As a matter of fact, it is far less reasonable in dealing with a complicated civilization, and with 125,000,000 people. On the island, if only for purposes of self-protection, the banker will have a healthy regard for the feelings of his fellow-citizens, and will not press his advantage too far. Moreover, he will be in a position where he understands the exact needs of the particular community.

Neither of these considerations apply to the banking system of the United States.

In the main, the interest of the banker is opposed to that of the general community. He is lavish with credit in good times, when it is not needed, and he withholds it in bad times, when it is a necessity. Someone has said that the banks lend you an umbrella in fine weather, and take it away from you when it rains. Furthermore, the bankers of the United States, even if we grant them the best intentions in the world, are not in a position to work in cooperation in support of any definite policy. They have the power to issue vastly more credit than is ever actually necessary. Sometimes they do this. At other times they issue so little that the economic system cannot be carried on. Then we get starvation in the midst of plenty, such as we are enjoying at the present day.

Our bankers may be compared to a number of theater agents, each of whom is authorized to sell an indefinite number of tickets in a theater. The total seating capacity of the theater, we will say, is 3,000. If 500 tickets are issued, or if 6,000 tickets are issued, in either case the results are disastrous. It is a hit-and-miss method.

In my judgment, the only agency which should be authorized to issue tickets for the national theater is the Nation itself. Call these tickets tokens, or scrip, or dollars, as you will. The National Government must decide as to how many are needed.

For, mind you, it is not merely the private individual who is forced to pay tribute to this strange, unreasonable system. The great industries, the great producers of the country, who are creating their share of the national credit, have each one of them to pay tribute to a bank in order to make use of the credit which they are creating.

And what about the Government itself? Here we have a financial crisis, due in large measure to the stupidity of the bankers, and the futility of the system under which they are working. The purchasing power of the country has dwindled to a vanishing point. Millions upon millions are out of work and have no means of support. The Government is fulfilling its primary duty when it comes to the rescue of these people.

The amount that we are spending for public works and relief may seem large when figured in dollars and cents, but it is not a drop in the bucket compared to the credit of this country as measured in its natural resources, in its plant, and in its man power. Yet what does the Government do when it goes to the rescue of its needy and starving citizens? It floats loans through the banks. It pays interest to private organizations for the use of its own credit. The thing becomes still more preposterous when we realize that an enormous proportion of the relief expended by the Government has gone to the aid of the great banking institutions. So that actually the Government of the United States is getting itself into debt to the banks for the privilege of helping them to regain their strangle hold on the economic life of the country.

To my mind, this situation should have been stopped in March 1933. The bankers were then helpless and hopeless. They thought the end had come. They would, themselves, have welcomed a liquidation of their assets in favor of the Government. Now, it will be more difficult. Yet the logical situation remains the same, and we are going to have to reestablish in the hands of the Federal Government the right which the Constitution placed there in the first place.

I am now preparing a bill which is intended to accomplish this result. I wish that we might have a chance to vote on it at the present session. If that is impossible, it will be largely due to the lack of public pressure, public interest, and public understanding on the subject. The creation of a national bank which will eventually have a monopoly of the issuance of credit is, to my mind, the most vital need of the country today. I do not mean that that alone will get us out of the depression, but it is the first step in that direction, the first step without which none of the others can be taken.

When I have argued this point in the past I have met with two general objections. The first is that it will put the banks into politics, and substitute in making loans partisan considerations for sound principles of banking. Now, I have no doubt that, to some extent, this will be the case. Partisan politics have crept into most departments of our public life, and it would be rash to assume that banking could be exempted. But let me say, first, that no politician in high public office in the history of this country has ever made such a complete mess of his job as the private bankers have made with theirs. Furthermore, your public servants are as good or as bad as you choose to make them. If you do not like them, or you do not approve of the way in which they handle their offices, you can replace them with others. As things stand, the people elect their Governors, their representatives in Congress and in the Senate, and their President. But none of these men, nor all of them put together, has anything to say about what concerns most vitally the people of the United States, the distributive system, or the money system, if you prefer that term. Until the system is changed, the bankers are the real rulers of the people. You can vote for your President—you cannot vote as to who shall be head of the National City Bank of New York, or of J. P. Morgan & Co. There is no reason why you should, so long as these men are functioning as private citizens. Yet at the present time it is these men who actually control the destinies of every human being, not only in this country, but in this hemisphere. I say this not in criticism of any individuals, but of a system of bondage under which it is disgraceful for free men to live.

The second objection usually made to national banking is that it is a radical idea, and would be used for socialistic or communistic purposes. This does not follow at all. A national bank might be used for radical purposes. It might also be used for extremely reactionary purposes. There is a very interesting article by Mr. Herbert Agar in the current issue of the American Review. It is entitled "The Task of Conservatism." Mr. Agar thinks we have gone too far toward socialism. He believes in going back a hundred years to the conditions which prevailed in the early nineteenth century. Let me read you a few words from his final conclusions: "The first prerequisite for a return to a system of private property is that the state should reassume its basic sovereign power—the power to issue and recall money and credit. At present that power has been given to a private monopoly, chiefly on the plea that it is too important to trust to the politician. I feel no call to praise the typical modern politician, but it is fair to point out that his repute is no lower than that of the typical modern banker."

So you see that once you have control of the banking system you may use it to carry out any policy which you choose. At present you have nothing to say about the policy which is to be carried out.

I have quoted from the Constitution of the United States, certainly not a radical document. Let me also quote from that classical exponent of sound finance, John Stuart Mill: "The idea of a rational democracy is not that the people govern themselves, but that they have security for good government. This security they cannot have by any other means than by retaining in their own hands the ultimate control."

The ultimate control rests today neither with the people nor with the representatives of the people, but with a body of private citizens who, no matter how high-minded they may be as individuals, are responsible to no one but themselves. Let us as free Americans resume that ultimate control of the distributive system which the Fathers of our Republic intended us to have.

MONEY CONTROL

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by Senator NYE, of North Dakota, last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has it come to pass that Senators cannot get their speeches inserted in the RECORD in the other body? That is a remarkable situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I suppose the speech could be gotten in the RECORD over there, but Senator NYE is a personal friend of mine, and I believe in many of his ideas, though not 100 percent. In any event, this is a good speech.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the second occasion this morning where, in order to get into the RECORD an address delivered by a Senator, the request is made here in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota, over the National Broadcasting chain luncheon at Cosmos Club, Saturday, May 19, 1934:

Few there are to doubt what has been declared in the past to the effect that whoever controls the money of a nation controls that nation. It does seem to me, however, that we might more accurately say that control of the nation goes to those who, by manipulation, can make existing money and banking credit create fictitious values upon which a return must be paid by the American consumer such as creates profit on value that does not exist.

During the dozen boom years leading up to 1929 capital structure in America took on a growth so great as to challenge comparison with any 50-year period in American history. But the growth, for the most part, was of a kind that could not do other than destroy the health of our entire economic structure from top to bottom as it was virtually destroyed, starting in 1929. This growth was the result of manipulation by those who controlled the money of the Nation. While it was affording, through larger concentration, a greater control over the money of the Nation by the few, it was at the same time distressing to and making public charges of more of the masses of American people. Poverty and distress came to those masses not alone because of their play as sheep waiting to be sheared in the booming stock market, but more particularly because of the burden which was placed upon the consumer by reason of the will to make the public pay such prices as would afford a return upon the swollen capital investment and structure of business and industry.

An example revealing how burdensome this manipulation and unhealthy capital structure growth has been is to be found in the case of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. Prices were charged and are being charged for steel, which plays so large a part in construction and effort to accomplish recovery, such as would enable the Bethlehem Steel Corporation to pay a return not alone upon its true capital, but upon that part of its capitalization which was nothing more than wind and water. In addition to this, consumer prices on steel had to be large enough to pay bonuses to Bethlehem executives, bonuses so sizeable that in 1 year a lone executive was enjoying a bonus of more than a million dollars in addition to his excessively large salary. This is alleged to have constituted robbery of Bethlehem Steel stockholders, but it was something more than that. It was robbery of the American public as well. This kind of program created costs in construction which, when entered into the capitalization of that industry which was constructing with steel, added to the prices which consumers had to pay not alone today, but for all time to come in order that there could be a so-called "reasonable return upon capital investment."

The cement industry affords another glaring example of what was done to the consumer of today and the consumer of tomorrow who may be interested in the prices of this great building commodity. The boom days found investment bankers purchasing small manufacturing units, merging them, and selling stock in the merged company to the public for two and three times as much as they had actually paid for the properties. Upon the basis of these fictitious valuations the industry appealed to the Congress and received tariff protection such as would enable them to maintain prices for cement which would offer opportunity to pay a return upon the investment which had been made in such outrageous manipulation on the stock market. As long as capital structure thus created is permitted to stand, that long are the American people going to be compelled to pay prices which are burdensome and destructive, and kept from honest opportunity for accomplishment of real industrial recovery.

Our attention has very recently been called to the fact that we may contemplate ultimate ownership of American railroads by the Government. Millions upon millions of dollars have been poured by the Government into the railroad structure in an endeavor to keep it alive. Close students insist that the time is only a few years off when the railroad owners themselves will be urging the Government to run and operate them. Commissioner Eastman, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, within the last few days warned the public to plan as though public ownership were to be ultimately dealt with.

I leave to others at this luncheon discussion relative to the merit of public ownership of railroads, with which I have very great sympathy. I wish to discuss thus briefly alone the question of capitalization which will assuredly be involved when it comes to really deal with the problem of our Government's possession of the railroads.

In the first place, it may well be pointed out that the Government has already granted concessions and loaned money to railroads to an extent that may well be accepted as representing about all the railroads are worth. In any event, the real battle ultimately will not be one to determine whether or not the Government shall take over the railroads, but at what price the deal shall be made. Naturally, the banking interests which are so largely involved in our present railroad structure are going to be insistent upon prices based upon the water that has been pumped into the capital structure of railroads down through all these generations—prices that will meet every cent of bonding and stocks which the railroads have issued. In other words, if left to the bankers, the Government would take over the railroads at a price such as would forever prevent a reasonable return being made upon the investment through a rate structure that was in any degree reasonable, and without terrific burden upon the back of the American consumer. When Government ownership comes, it should come in a way that would enable the Government to start from scratch with an honest opportunity to make Government ownership of railroads pay. The wastes and manipulation by railroad builders in other days must be wiped out, and not one penny more should be paid for the railroads by the Government than represents the actual cost of the property to be taken over.

Capitalization in industry has found, especially during the recent boom years, a complete abandonment of true values.

A study of capital structure in American industry all too clearly reveals the need for vast reform if we are ever to enjoy a measurable degree of prosperity for the people. In 1931, for example, corporations with capital assets of $50,000,000 or more numbered 632. These 632 corporations possessed over half of the total assets of all corporations. These 632 paid over three fifths of the total of corporation cash dividends paid during the year, and included all the large financial, industrial, railroad, power, and natural resource enterprises.

The power and influence exercised by these few giants is all too evident. It can fairly be said that the destiny of the economic structure of America is in the hands of these few. Into their capital structure there has been poured much water. Upon this water and the true values involved selling costs and prices are based. These prices enter very largely into the lives of all Americans and in a great measure determine their prosperity. It was a terrific overload of this sort that the people found upon their backs in 1929, and which caused the crash from which we have not even yet recovered. And we are not going to recover until we can sluff off that part of capital structure which is representative of anything other than true wealth invested in actual and productive values.

In these manipulated markets of 1925 to 1929, we never asked questions about the real values in a share of stock. We did not stop long enough to learn what were the earnings of the concern in which we bought an interest. We but wanted to know how much the price of a share of stock had jumped the day before, and the manipulators saw to it that a healthy gain was shown.

This mad race for easy money while the manipulators at the pumps were busy pumping water into capitalization and creating, through mergers and otherwise, false and fictitious valuations for industrial enterprises, found capital withdrawn from worthy fields, and saw interest and solicitation lost for fundamental and honest industry.

It is quite proper to say that factors within our economic structure for those years leading up to 1929 were bent upon destroying it from within, and succeeded in no uncertain measure. Yet we speak of our economic structure as having suffered a break-down in 1929 as though some force from outside had moved upon the structure with malice and intent to crush it.

Likewise, we refer to those years between 1925 and 1929 as the years of our greatest prosperity, while as a matter of fact, they were years in which the few were reaping great harvests while the interests of the masses of the people were ruthlessly ignored, and while our economic structure was actually in the throes of death and destruction.

Ignoring of these truths and refusing to face these facts would afford some amusement were it not for the fact that we are today devoting our national energy in a great drive to win new and renewed life for our economic structure with the fiction rather than the truth of 1915 to 1929 as our blueprint. It follows that we waste these energies. Economic recovery will never be accomplished by construction upon the drifting and uncertain sands washed up by the boom days, those days of our so-called "greatest prosperity." It grows increasingly evident that extensive programs of public ownership are about the only answer in this hour to the continued greed of the possessors of America's money.

WHAT CHANCE HAS THE FARMER?

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD of Wednesday, tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, the American farmer is confronted with almost insurmountable obstacles growing out of a world-wide increased production and decreased consumption of his products. The American farmer is unquestionably the most resourceful, thrifty, patient, and dependable American citizen. Give him any sort of a fair and equal opportunity and he will come out on top. There is one thing which he cannot overcome, and that is an intolerable, uneconomic, and discriminatory conduct on the part of his own Government.

There must be some radical changes in the personnel and in the program of the Department of Agriculture if there is to be any hope for the farmer. This Department is supposed to operate for the farmer's benefit. It was established for that purpose. In actual practice we now find that this Department is loaded down with officials who are primarily interested in socializing this country and establishing a society according to their fancies and ideas rather than bringing profit to the farmer.

The wheat program in the Department of Agriculture is a fair example. It is trying to reduce the production of wheat. At the same time the Department of Agriculture has another program in which it is doing everything within its power to reduce the consumption of wheat in the United States. This second program destroys any good which might possibly be obtained by the first program of reducing the production of wheat. In fact, if the Department can accomplish both of these purposes, it would, in the end, make present matters immeasurably worse.

It seems incredible that the Department of Agriculture would be carrying on an aggressive and deliberate effort to reduce the American wheat farmer's market at home, yet, none the less, this is actually what the Department of Agriculture is doing.

In November 1933 the Department of Agriculture issued circular no. 296, which advocates an annual human consumption of 130 pounds of wheat per person. This circular or bulletin no. 296 sets forth what the Department of Agriculture advocates to be an adequate and balanced diet. This bulletin is being circularized throughout the country for the purpose of prevailing upon the people to adopt the diet prescribed by this circular. The diet which is advocated in this circular recommends an annual consumption of 130 pounds of wheat per capita. The Department of Agriculture, not content with one publication, issued Miscellaneous Publication No. 183, published in December 1933. This publication likewise advocates an annual consumption of 130 pounds of wheat per person.

The present actual annual consumption of wheat is 170 pounds per capita. Thus, by these two bulletins, the Department of Agriculture appeals to the people of the United States to reduce their consumption of wheat 40 pounds per capita annually. This is a reduction of 23 percent in the American human consumption of wheat. This amounts to reducing the consumption 112 million bushels per year. This 112 million bushels of wheat represent 8 million acres of wheat.

These two bulletins presenting what the Department of Agriculture claims is the proper diet are being given wide circulation throughout the United States. In many instances they are used in the schools.

This criticism of these bulletins is equally as much a criticism of bureaucracy as it is criticism of those who have political control of the Department of Agriculture. Those in the Bureau of Home Economics who prepared these bulletins are not political appointees. They are civil-service appointees. They are, therefore, a part of the permanent bureaucracy of the Department of Agriculture. While Secretary Wallace and the political appointees who are in charge of the Department are not responsible for the preparation of these bulletins, yet they are responsible for permitting these bureaucratic subordinates to give these bulletins circulation.

In the beginning I said that the Department of Agriculture is loaded with officials and a personnel who are primarily interested in socializing the country rather than in obtaining a fair profit for existing American agriculture. As to the truth of this statement I offer this quotation from the foregoing mentioned bulletin no. 183 which was published by the Department of Agriculture in December 1933:

> The general use of either of the two diets at the higher levels of nutritive content would not only improve the health and efficiency of the population but at the same time would foster the type of agriculture which represents wise utilization of land for the country as a whole.

By this statement, we see that these busybodies and experimenters in the Department of Agriculture are taking upon themselves the responsibility of endeavoring to chart out a health course for all of the American people and to dictate what they think is the type of agriculture which represents wise utilization of the land for the country as a whole. They have no interest whatever in what the farmer, who owns and tills the land, thinks is the wise utilization of the land. They are determined to dictate what is the wise utilization of the land.

In the first place, the diet which is set up by these dreamers and experimenters is by most respectable authority condemned as a silly and unwise diet. Among such respectable authority who disagree with the diet prescribed by the Bureau of Home Economics of the Department of Agriculture is Dr. Lafayette Mendal, dean of the department of physiological chemistry of Yale University. As a proper diet Dr. Mendal supports a diet consisting of 30 percent white flour. For the average person, the diet prescribed by Dr. Mendal provides for the consumption of 195 pounds of wheat per person per year. Thus Dr. Mendal recommends a diet which would provide for an increase in the consumption of wheat of 25 pounds per year above present consumption while this Bureau in the Department of Agriculture is appealing to the people of the United States to reduce the consumption 40 pounds a year.

Another most eminent authority who disagrees with these experimenting bureaucrats in the Department of Agriculture is Dr. E. V. McCollum of Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore, Md. Dr. McCollum in a recently published article stated:

> In my opinion, the American diet should consist of about 40 percent wheat flour.

Under this diet recommended by Dr. McCollum, the people would consume well over 200 pounds of wheat per person per year.

Further discussing the subject, Dr. McCollum said:

> Bread, in my opinion, should form the principal source of energy in the American diet. I say this because any system of diet must be sound from the agriculture standpoint as well as sound physiologically. The United States has a large territory which is preeminently suited to the growing of wheat and the well-being of many farmers can best be achieved through wheat culture. Wheat should, therefore, remain our principal bread grain.

Thus Dr. Mendal, of Yale University, in recommending a diet whereby the American people would consume 195 pounds of wheat per person per year, and Dr. McCollum, of Johns Hopkins University, in recommending a diet whereby the people would consume more than 200 pounds of wheat per year per person, are infinitely better friends of the American wheat producer than the women in the Bureau of Home Economics of the Department of Agriculture. These two eminent doctors of these two outstanding universities owe no specific allegiance to the wheat farmer, while in the Department of Agriculture we find these mere experimenters in the Bureau of Home Economics who owe their allegiance to the American farmer advocating a reduced consumption of wheat.

If these dreamers and experimenters in the Department of Agriculture are right, then it is most remarkable that the American people have been able to build up a civilization upon their former diet, which civilization has never lost a war, has increased the span of life, and throughout the years has been the most prosperous civilization that the world has ever known.

Not only by their deeds, but by their words, we know that these officials are socializers and experimenters who are determined to wreck agriculture as we have known it, and the governmental and economic structures as we have known them, in order to accomplish their purpose of planning and remaking American people according to their fancy.

Let us call the roll of some of those who are in charge of the Agriculture Department. Secretary Wallace is far more a dreamer and philosopher than a practical business man or agriculturist. By many of his published articles, he discloses himself to be one who is completely out of sympathy with what the American people have accomplished and have been. In a series of recently published religious articles, he referred to all of us Americans as being "sons of David, licentious and contentious." In another of these articles, after commenting upon the tremendous earnestness of the reformers of the sixteenth century, he followed with this statement. I quote from Secretary Wallace:

> The only people of this century who have a comparable earnestness are such men as Lenin, Mussolini, and Hitler.

Prof. Rexford Tugwell, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and obviously the dominant personality of the Department of Agriculture, is determined to break down the American governmental and economic structures and supplant both of them with some form of new plan of society modeled after his personal fancies. In a speech before the American Economic Association, he stated that three changes were required in order to have a limited acceptance of the planning idea. These changes were: First, uprooting and changing constitutions and statutes; second, destroying private business as we have known it; and, third, destroying the sovereignty of the States.

After setting forth these requirements, he makes this bold statement:

> All three of these wholesale changes are required by even a limited acceptance of the planning idea.

Obviously the A.A.A. is at least a limited acceptance of a planned agriculture. As proof that the Agriculture Department regards the allotment plan as planned agriculture, I quote from the April issue of the Consumers' Guide which is published by the Department of Agriculture:

> To earn a share in the money, the farmer must become a partner in the Government's new experiment in "planned agriculture."

Notwithstanding the fact that Professor Tugwell made clear in his speech before the American Economic Association that the price of a limited acceptance of the planning idea meant the uprooting of constitutions and statutes, destroying business as we have known it, and destroying the sovereignty of the States, he expressed in this speech his undying love for planned economy. He expressed his love for a planned economy in this speech with the following words:

> This is one of the basic reasons why the prospect of a planned economy is so congenial to every other hope and belief which I have.

Jerome Frank, attorney for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration is another dominating personality in the Department of Agriculture. The Cooperative Dairy Defense Committee recently issued a statement in defense of the dairy farmers of the United States. In this statement it severely criticized the A.A.A. and the views of Mr. Frank pertaining to profits. In this statement the Dairy Defense Committee stated:

> The A.A.A. has refused to accept the counsel or heed the plans suggested by practical leaders in the dairy industry. Had such a plan been followed, the dairy industry would now be well on its way to stabilization.

Of course, this stabilization implies that a profit motive may be considered by both producers and distributors.

Mr. Frank, however, states that such profit motive is only one of our "current folkways."

Now, what hope is there for a farmer to obtain a profit from an agricultural program when one of the principal administrators speaks so disparagingly of profit as to refer to the profit motive as only one of our "current folkways"?

Another dominating personality in the Agriculture Department is Frederick Howe, consumers' counsel of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. During the war Mr. Howe was commisssioner of immigration of Ellis Island. As commissioner it was his duty to deport anarchists. On June 21, 1919, Representative LaGuardia, of New York, made the charge on the floor of the House of Representatives that while it was the duty of Commissioner Howe to deport alien anarchists, yet, instead of deporting them, he acted as their counsel.

At the same time Representative Siegel, from the State of New York, in speaking of Mr. Howe, said:

It is useless to have a Commissioner of Immigration at New York away from his post of duty. He presided as chairman over what proved to be the largest Russian meeting held in Madison Square Garden a few weeks ago.

Shortly after these two speeches in the House of Representatives Mr. Howe resigned as Commissioner of Immigration of Ellis Island. Can anyone believe that a man with the record of Mr. Howe can possibly be interested in any program which will bring profit to the American farmer?

Another important personality in the Department of Agriculture is Miss Kneeland, who holds a most responsible position in the Bureau of Home Economics. It is this Bureau which put out these two circulars advocating a reduced consumption of wheat. In a recent congressional hearing she made clear that she had no sympathy with an economic program, the goal of which was to restore the price levels to 1926. She made it clear that her goal was what she termed as "a more abundant life." It was impossible to obtain any clear understanding from her as to just what she regards as "a more abundant life." Whatever may be said when she opposes the restoration of the 1926 price level she is not reflecting the views of the American farmers. This is true, notwithstanding the fact that she receives a handsome salary for working in the Department of Agriculture, which Department should be working for the interest of the farmers. Unquestionably the farmer would like to trade the present conditions for the 1926 conditions. Wheat in 1926 was worth $1.45 a bushel. It is worth about 76 cents at this time.

In a speech at Philadelphia, Professor Tugwell made a clear-cut statement as to what is the present governmental farm program. I quote from the concluding words of his speech:

Private control has failed to use wisely its control of land. * * * For the first time, the Government is thinking of the land as a whole. For the first time, we are preparing to build a land program which will control the use of that greatest of all natural resources, not merely for the benefit of those who happen to hold title to it, but for the greater welfare of all the citizens of the country.

This program is not in keeping with the free, independent American farm program which we have known. It is more in keeping with the philosophy of Stalin and Marx. Communistic Russia has prepared a land program not for the welfare of those who happen to hold title to the land, but what the Soviet thinks is for the welfare of all the citizens of Russia.

Thus in accordance with the statements of Mr. Tugwell, the Government is now engaged in a land program which is not merely for the benefit of the American farmer who happens to hold title to it, but for what Tugwell and the Agriculture Department thinks is for the greater welfare of all of the citizens of the country.

The net result of what the Department of Agriculture is doing, together with what Mr. Tugwell said was the Government's present land program, makes a statement made by Professor Tugwell before the American Economic Association in December 1931 strikingly significant. That statement of Professor Tugwell is as follows:

Many observers are observing the contemporary Russian practice and are recording carefully the experience there, which later may be of assistance to us, for instance, my (Tugwell's) Experimental Control in Russian Industry, also Heinrichs and Brown, The Planned Economy of Soviet Russia.

Professor Tugwell's statement in his Philadelphia speech is similar to the foregoing quoted statement from bulletin no. 183 in which it was said by the use of the diets which are advocated, there would be "fostered the type of agriculture which represents wise utilization of the land for the country as a whole."

If the Government is carrying out a land program as Mr. Tugwell said, then it is being done by this socialistic Department of Agriculture's perverting the Agriculture Adjustment Act. No legislation has ever been enacted authorizing the Government to engage in a land program to control the land. The only land which the Government has any legal control over is the public domain, but Mr. Tugwell was not talking about the public domain. He was talking about all the land. He made clear the statement that their program was to control all the land not merely for the benefit of those who happen to hold title to it.

The Department of Agriculture by forcing a reduction in the agricultural production through the A.A.A. and then advocating a further reduction in the consumption of wheat, the principal food product, is dominating and controlling the land. One thing is certain, Mr. Tugwell was correct when he said that the program was not for the benefit of the man who happened to hold title to it.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE BILL

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own radio address in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over the N.B.C. network, 9:45 eastern standard time, May 14, 1934:

My friends, that we should have our stock markets and security markets operate within certain specified limitations has been proven by the fact that at least 99 percent of the legitimate operators of the stock markets of the Nation agree with Congress that the Government should cooperate in regulating the stock exchanges of the country.

I favor such a measure because the stock-exchange people and big business generally realize that they must have some set-up by which they can regulate their business so as to assure stability and restore confidence in the markets of the Nation and the markets of the world.

The stock-exchange markets and big business enterprises of the Nation announced to the world in 1929 that they were no longer able to control the business enterprises which they themselves had built up. In other words, their business enterprises went to smash, which was the most effective way they could announce their failure to run their business.

I think the whole bunch of them are more to be pitied than censured—pitied because they did not know, and did not know that they did not know, until it was too late and the crash of 1929 was on them.

Those who controlled and managed the stock exchanges and security exchanges of the Nation either had no vision or did not know that the stock-market structure or security structure that they had built was unsound socially and economically. Thus the 1929 crash came and carried down with it millions of people who had invested their money with these institutions.

Those who were on the inside saw the markets tottering under the great boulder of mismanagement, and, realizing that the millions—yes, billions—of worthless securities and watered stock would drive to ruin not only millions of individuals but thousands of mills and factories and mines and farms, set out to save from the wreckage all that they could.

We recall how they marshaled their forces in November 1929 and then gathered under their wings as much of the safe and sound securities as they could, and then stood at attention until the crash came.

I well recall how the people in the Midwest gathered around the path where the cyclone had swept the day before. We all well recall the scenes and the conversations in the homes, the streets, the market places, the business places, the drug stores, the barber shops, the day and days following the financial cyclone of 1929, the greatest cyclone of its kind that ever hit the American people.

Most of us remember vividly how this cyclone destroyed not only thousands of banks but tens of thousands of homes, and scores of mills and factories and mines. We saw thousands and tens of thousands of honest, hard-working, God-fearing men and women who had saved a few thousand dollars for a rainy day lose their all. They had put their trust in these institutions and their savings; their ideals were not only shattered, but they were sent to almshouses, poorhouses, or thrust upon the charity of their friends or relatives, all because of the lack of proper management of big banking institutions, stock markets, and security institutions.

I am not ready to say what percent of these multiplied millions of worthless securities that were floated in our markets in 1929 were worthless because of loopholes in our law, or what percent were worthless because of bad management on the part of these institutions; but in either case, everyone realizes that the structure was weak or the crash would not have materialized.

In an industrial Nation like ours, where there are big units of business, we must ever keep before us the fact that these big units have a tendency to grow soulless in their operations. Of course, 99 percent or more of the officials of these corporations are honest and upright gentlemen, but the individuals employed in any corporation are usually pushed to the place where the books must show in the black; hence the very nature of the set-up of such a procedure is destructive in itself. Individuality is removed through such a set-up. Cold figures and margins of profit slowly place such institutions in an atmosphere wholly material and altogether soulless. Therefore, such institutions, like dangerous individuals, must be managed and regulated by an authority that is always operating in the best interests of all the people.

Some people live on the theory, "Don't do anything lest you do the wrong thing"; others operate on the basis of "Go ahead and do something, and if you do the wrong thing, adjust it as often as necessary until you are doing the right thing."

This administration is operating on the last-mentioned theory. I am glad that it is. We never get any place if we stand still. The last administration either ran around in a circle or else stood still and thus brought about the stagnation of every industry, mine, and mill. This Congress, this administration, is doing constructive things, sometimes wrong, of course, but, thank God, if the set-up does not work we are willing to adjust it to another level until it does work. It is hard to see how anyone would raise his voice against the regulation of the stock markets and security markets after realizing what happened in the last 6 or 7 years.

One thing every individual knows—one thing Congress knows—one thing the opponents of this bill realize—and that is that a government that permits institutions like a stock market to spring up within its own borders that can no longer be controlled is a government that needs adjustments, and needs them at once, if it is to protect its business interests and the interests of its citizens.

Can the Members of Congress of a great Nation say to the people that institutions which are eating out the very vitals of a nation have grown to such proportions that we can no longer manage them? I, for one, say "no." We can control, if we will, any and all of the institutions of our land. We can control the security markets of the Nation. We can control the stock exchanges of the Nation. We can control the banking institutions of the Nation. The deplorable collapse of the Nation's banking system in March 1933 is evidence that the Government must cooperate in guiding and directing the banking system of this Nation. By way of parentheses, I wish to say that right now an administration measure is under consideration to give aid to those who have their money tied up in closed banks.

In this matter of control I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not want to see a set-up in our banks and stock markets that would make it possible for some group of know-nothing investigators or so-called "government experts" to step in and upset the workings or management of a mill, a factory, a mine, or a bank. That is not the intent and the purpose of this stock-market measure. The intent and the purpose of this measure is to throw out this group of know-nothings and bad managers and to keep them out.

A few of the specific provisions of the stock exchange bill are as follows:

First. (a) The control of credit; (b) the power to control markets. The main purpose is to give a Government credit agency an effective method of reducing the aggregate amount of the Nation's credit resources.

Second. Control of manipulative practices. The bill forbids absolutely those pools operating and other devices by which professional speculators bring up fictitious prices. The bill seeks to give investors prices where markets may be established by the free and honest balancing of investment demand and investment supply.

Third. A provision for adequate and honest reports. It is fundamental that no one can safely buy or sell securities without an intelligent basis for judgment; no one can obtain such a basis without full and true reports. This has been recognized by the officials of the leading exchanges and they welcome this feature.

Fourth. Control of unfair practices by corporate insiders. In order to curb speculation by officers in the stocks of their own companies, the bill provides for disclosures by officers and directors and the large inside stockholders. Moreover, the Commission is given power to regulate proxies so the stockholders will no longer blindly approve acts of management in violation of the corporation's rights.

Fifth. The exchanges themselves are regulated on the theory that the exchanges are public institutions which the public is invited to use for the purchase and sale of securities listed thereon, and are not simply private clubs to be conducted only in accordance with their members' interests.

The bill is not a moral pose or a vengeful strikeback at brokers for the losses which nearly the entire Nation has suffered in the last 5 years. It is simply an earnest attempt to make belated intelligent adjustments long required by changing conditions.

The way to restore the confidence of business is to restore in the market places of the Nation those standards of honesty and fair dealing which alone can serve as a basis of confidence. This is precisely what the present bill will accomplish.

This bill, along with some 20 other citizenship-building and Nation-building measures enacted by the Seventy-third Congress, further completes the bridge which leads to permanent and social economic recovery. It is just another granite pillar in the Roosevelt administrative program—a program designed to equally help the farmer, the laborer, and the business man.

INDIAN LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] is recognized for 10 minutes at this time. The gentleman from Oklahoma requests that he be not interrupted during those 10 minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that I ask in advance unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to analyze and discuss the bill prepared under the direction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, commonly known as the Wheeler-Howard bill (H.R. 7902).

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has toured the West in advocacy of the provisions of this bill. Releases have been extensively carried in the press of the country commending the provisions of the bill. Radio addresses have been made to create public sentiment in its favor. Employees in the Indian Service have been intimidated into support of the bill, with the threat of dismissal from the service. They have been active throughout every Indian community in assembling Indians and having them endorse prepared resolutions in an effort to show that Indian sentiment favors the bill. The actual truth is that the bill is so complicated that but few, if any, Indians, understand its provisions. Extensive hearings have been held, both before the House and Senate Committees on Indian Affairs. The bill has been revised a number of times.

The original bill covers 48 printed pages and has four separate titles:

Title I—Indian self-government—covers 22 pages and in general provides for chartering Indian communities, granting them local self-government similar to that exercised by all of the Indian tribes throughout the United States a century ago.

Section 1 is a declaration of policy sought to be accomplished through the granting of local self-government.

Section 2 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a charter to Indians on any reservation or subdivision thereof, granting them certain enumerated powers subject to ratification by three-fifths vote of the residents of the area covered. In the event land is acquired by the Secretary of the Interior he shall prescribe conditions under which one may become a member if of one-fourth Indian blood, and acceptance of membership is a vote for the acceptance of the charter. Under this section any number of charters could be granted to groups or subdivisions of one tribe. And if the tribe should by vote reject the charter, those occupying an area of a purchased tract could accept and be granted powers of self-government within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 3 provides that each charter shall define the territorial limits of the community, prescribe a form of government for the community, its management, the bonding of community officials and Federal employees, and for continuing supervision by the Office of Indian Affairs as the Secretary may find necessary.

Section 4 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to grant to chartered communities certain enumerated powers: (a) To organize and act as a Federal municipal corporation, to establish a form of government, to adopt and amend their constitution, and to promulgate and enforce ordinances; (b) to elect officers, agents, or employees, fix their salaries, prescribe qualifications of voters, and for adoption of new members; (c) to regulate the use and disposition of property by members of the community and to protect the health and to provide for the general welfare of the community; (d) to establish courts for the enforcement of ordinances of the communities with exclusive jurisdiction over its members, and jurisdiction, exclusive or nonexclusive, over all other cases arising under the ordinances of the community, both civil and criminal, with authority to punish by fine up to $500 and by imprisonment up to 6 months; (e) to accept the surrender of tribal or community interests of individual members, to act as guardians, or provide for the appointment of guardians for minors, and to administer tribal and individual funds transferred or intrusted to the communities by the Federal Government; (f) to operate, maintain, and equip any public improvement, and as a Federal agency, to condemn and take title to lands or properties, to levy assessments, or require performance of labor in lieu of assessments; (g) to acquire, manage, and dispose of property, to declare and pay out dividends, to adopt and use a corporate seal, to sue and be sued, and to employ counsel; (h) to compel the transfer of any Federal employee for inefficiency; (i) to exercise any other powers delegated by the Office of Indian Affairs and to act as a Federal agency; (j) and to exercise any other powers necessary or incidental to the exercise of the enumerated powers.

The Indian community so chartered shall be recognized as the successor to any existing political power and successor to all right, interest, and title to all funds, property, choses in action, and to claims against the United States heretofore held by the tribes or other native political organization.

Section 5 requires regular reports from the chartered authorities to the community. It may compel the transfer of any person employed from the community other than persons appointed by the community. Then follows a saving proviso giving broad powers to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to prescribe such conditions for the exercise of this power as will assure to employees reasonable security of tenure in office.

Section 6 directs the Secretary to prepare annual estimates for expenditures for functions and services administered by each community, transmit them to the Indian community and transmit the recommendation of the Indian community to the Bureau of the Budget. If not a direct, this is an implied, promise to finance the expenditures of each community from the Federal Treasury.

He shall transmit a copy of any bill for the expenditure of funds in any community and transmit the recommendations of the community to Congress.

He shall transmit the description of any project for expenditure of funds in any community.

No expenditure on any project is to be reimbursable unless approved by the community, and any funds of the community shall be expended only by the bonded disbursing agent of the community. This section clearly indicates that these expenses are to be borne by the Federal Government.

Section 7. The Secretary may delegate to any Indian community any function of government now exercised by the United States.

Section 8. The Commissioner is authorized to classify and transfer functions and services administered for Indians and make all necessary rules and regulations.

The community may appoint officers, but only with the approval of the Commissioner, and the community upon a three-fourths vote may request the transfer of any function.

Section 8 is a long-involved section but requires (a) that the community must comply with all the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior; (b) directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out funds to bonded disbursing officers of any community; (c) requires the Commissioner to turn over lands and buildings previously used for Indians, to the community; (d) when the Secretary determines that the community has failed to comply with the conditions imposed he may reassume the administration of any functions of service; (e) requires reports from the community on or before September 1 of each year as of date June 30; (f) requires the Secretary to make an annual report to Congress on the administration of functions and services transferred to the community. This bill would permit legislation for Indians through the charter route rather than by Congress.

Section 9 authorizes the Secretary and Commissioner to continue to exercise all the existing powers not transferred, and shall have power to enforce by administrative order or veto any provisions that limit, qualify, or restrict the powers granted to the community.

Section 10 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to convey as an agency of the Federal Government any right, interest, or title in property which may be held by the United States in trust for members of the community in any land, buildings, or equipment previously used by the United States in the administration of Indian affairs within the community.

Section 11 exempts Indian community property and land from taxation. How are the expenses of any community to be paid except through appropriations by Congress?

Section 12 authorizes an appropriation of $500,000 each fiscal year to pay expenses in organizing and developing Indian chartered communities, including building and furnishing community buildings, clerical supplies and the improvement of community land. Does anyone entertain the hope that Congress will appropriate and turn over to these Indian communities this sum annually to be expended by them?

There are many other details provided in title I, but to sum them all up it would permit segregating one or more or any number of areas as chartered communities within any State and granting to the members of the respective chartered communities, to all intents and purposes, the authority and powers exercised by Indian tribes a century ago. And Congress would be asked to make all necessary appropriations to pay the necessary expenses of these separate governments.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma may continue for 10 additional minutes, for he is discussing a very important matter in a very instructive way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the first place, let me qualify as one deeply interested in the general welfare of all Indian tribes and each individual Indian in the United States. I am an enrolled member of the Cherokee Tribe. I attended the Cherokee tribal public schools and was graduated from its boarding school, taught in the tribal public schools, practiced law in the tribal courts and represented the Cherokee Tribe in practically every capacity from superintendent of public schools, attorney general, delegate to represent the tribe at Washington, D.C., in securing the enactment of legislation, represented the tribe before the commission appointed by the Government to make its final roll and to allot its lands, and, finally, as national attorney for the tribe for a number of years, I appeared before the various commissions, the departments of Government, committees of Congress, and represented the tribe before the various courts of the country, including the Supreme Court of the United States.

Since my election to Congress in 1914 I challenge the examination of my record to show that there was a vote that I have cast which does not clearly show that I am in sympathy with the protection of the rights of Indians.

I prepared and assisted in the enactment of jurisdictional bills in 1924 authorizing each of the Five Civilized Tribes to bring suit against the Government for any and all claims which they have, and as a result these suits have been instituted and are now pending before the Court of Claims.

I assisted in securing the enactment of the act of May 10, 1928, which extended the restrictive period on the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes until April 26, 1956, and made 160 acres nontaxable, and the enactment of the act approved January 27, 1933, which continued the authority of the Secretary of the Interior over restricted Indian property, including the funds of unenrolled restricted Indians.

As a member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations I have made every effort to secure increased appropriations for education and health work among the several Indian tribes.

I mention this record for the purpose of showing that I approach the discussion of this bill from the standpoint of one who is himself an Indian and is in deep sympathy with all legislation and administration for the welfare of Indians.

I yield to no man in or out of Congress in my earnest desire to be helpful to all Indian tribes.

In the beginning, the government of Indians was placed under the immediate supervision of a Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who was under the general control of the War Department. The Indians then had vast areas of land, both east and west of the Mississippi River. Their control was transferred to the Interior Department when it was created under the act of March 3, 1849, and since that time a definite policy has been advocated toward the education, civilization, and gradual emancipation of the Indian. Prior to March 3, 1871, treaties were entered into by and between the Government of the United States and the several Indian tribes. This policy was discontinued through an act of Congress approved on that date, and thereafter for about 25 years agreements were entered into with Indian tribes for a number of years. The courts have held in many cases that a treaty had no more binding force than an agreement or act of Congress, and since the decision of the courts to that effect and for the past 30 years Congress has been exercising control over the Indians and their property by direct legislation, and this has been held to be constitutional by the courts.

In 1887 a general policy of allotting lands among the western Indian tribes was adopted, and the first lands were allotted with a trust patent preventing their alienation until a fee patent was granted 25 years thereafter.

The first agreements were made for the allotment of lands with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, the Creeks and Seminoles in 1897, and the Chickasaw and Choctaw and Creek agreements were ratified as amendments to the Curtis bill approved June 28, 1898. The Seminole agreement was subsequently ratified July 1, 1898. The Cherokees, not having entered into an agreement, Congress by an act of July 1, 1902, submitted an agreement to the Cherokee Tribe for ratification, which was done by a vote of the Cherokee people August 7, 1902. All of the agreements with the Five Civilized Tribes are similar. They provide for the enrollment of the members of each tribe, for allotment of their lands in severalty and the disbursement of their money.

The members of the Five Civilized Tribes were made citizens of the United States by act of March 3, 1901, and all other Indians were from time to time made citizens of the United States by various acts of Congress and, finally, by general law approved June 2, 1924, Congress declared all Indians citizens of the United States.

In the discussion of the Howard-Wheeler bill before the committees and on many public occasions, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has enlarged upon the vast amount of lands formerly held by Indian tribes, has sharply criticized the legislation by Congress, including the General Allotment Act of 1887, and in fact all acts of Congress and agreements looking to the individualization of the lands among the Indians of the several tribes. He charges that there has been mismanagement of Indian property and that the Indians of the United States have been despoiled of hundreds of millions of dollars. I heartily agree that there has been a great deal of mismanagement of Indian property. I agree that many treaties have been improvidently made. I assert that many others have been secured through coercive measures.

I think that this may be said of practically every treaty made with the Cherokees, of which tribe I am a member. The treaty of 1835, which resulted in the removal of the Cherokees west of the Mississippi River, reflects this clearly and was made with only a handful of Cherokees who did not properly represent the sentiment of the great mass of Cherokees at the time. The terms of the treaty of 1866 were forced upon the impoverished wards of the Nation and, in my judgment, without going into detail, there is not a treaty agreement made that was not secured by coercion. The act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, ratified by the Cherokees, was an acceptance of a choice between evils—the Curtis bill, approved June 28, 1898, which destroyed the Cherokee form of government and the so-called "Cherokee agreement." I think no one disputes but that the Indians, generally speaking, have been unfairly dealt with.

However, let me say that that is history. It serves no useful purpose for us to discuss the coercion by the Government or the maladministration of Indian affairs. That I fear is resorted to to lead us into a sympathetic atmosphere and away from a discussion of the details of the bill before us.

Our answer to this argument is that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs should give earnest consideration to a review of all treaties violated and to all moneys which the Government of the United States, in equity and good conscience, owes the Indians and make proper recommendations to the Congress either to make appropriations adequate to repay the Indians or recommend jurisdictional bills referring all of these claims to the Court of Claims with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Five Civilized Tribes have 41 suits pending in the Court of Claims, and the attorneys with whom contracts have been made complain that the Indian Bureau, because of the want of clerical help, is delaying reports, and therefore postponing the trial of these suits. It is suggested that if the making of the necessary reports were expedited it would greatly aid in bringing these and other suits filed on behalf of the Indian tribes to speedy trial.

I have not heard any argument to justify title I of the proposed Howard-Wheeler bill. It, in effect, turns the hands of Indian civilization back for a century.

During all of this time the Government has been engaged in an effort to have the Indians of the Nation accept citizenship, to study the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the several State governments, and to become a part of and participate in all governments—local, State, and National. You cannot otherwise develop the Indians into patriotic citizens and instill into them the purposes of the Government. The Indian was reluctant to give up his form of government, but our Government determined that it was best for the Indian. Most Indian governments, including the Five Civilized Tribes, have been abandoned for the past 30 years. It was with great difficulty that the Indians were induced to accept and to exercise the rights of citizenship. He is beginning to do this now. Untold thousands of Indians joined in the World War, and those who were fortunate enough to return did so as patriotic citizens of their State and Nation.

Twenty-two pages of the Wheeler-Howard bill looks to chartering Indian communities, to regrant to them certain powers of local self-government abolished almost a half century ago. What good would this accomplish? How would it advance the Indians? By the enactment of title 1 it prejudices the Indians against the Federal and State laws and encourages them to set up anew a different government and to make new laws. What we are trying to do is to have the Indians study our local laws, to become familiar with them, and to participate in local self-government.

In the State of Oklahoma, and this is measurably true in other States, all Indians are doing this. There is absolutely no discrimination against the Indian in Oklahoma. He is placed on an equality with every other citizen. He accepts the responsibility of citizenship, votes at all elections, and takes a part in local affairs the same as any other citizen. In my home county the sheriff, treasurer, court clerk, county clerk, county attorney, and perhaps other officers, including the mayor of my home city, are of Indian blood. There is no prejudice against them and they are elected on their merits.

We are trying to encourage every Indian to participate in local affairs. This bill will have the effect of segregating the Indians off into chartered communities and will result in their nonparticipation further in their local and State governments. The best way to teach anyone the philosophy of their State and Federal Governments is to have them participate in them and become a part of them. You cannot stand aloof and separate yourself and not participate in local government and at the same time be familiar with it. When you set up a separate form of government you say by the very act that the local government, State government, and Federal Government is not adequate, and you prejudice the Indian against the Government which he should patriotically and wholeheartedly support.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I hesitate to yield, having asked not to be interrupted, but I do not want to be discourteous to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. PEAVEY. I thank the gentleman. I would like to have the gentleman make clear to the membership that all the objectionable features of the original bill, H.R. 7902, have been stricken from the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am coming to that; and in my detailed analysis I have shown what they have taken out of the bill. I shall show also, before I get through, that there are some provisions in the revised bill that ought not to be enacted into law.

Mr. PEAVEY. It was so drastically amended that they took out everything but the title.

Mr. HASTINGS. The committee materially helped it by changing every provision except the title and writing a new bill.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. DISNEY. A moment ago the gentleman referred to the fact that the bill changed the law of descent and distribution. Is that change carried forward into the substitute bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. Section 4 of the revised bill provides against the sale, devise, gift, exchange, or transfer by operation of law or otherwise of restricted lands, except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and this language may repeal our partition laws and the method of determining heirs.

Why is title 1 necessary? What good will it do? What benefit will it be to the Indian? Are we not taught that our Federal Constitution and laws are the best ever devised by man? It is true we may not agree with each provision of the Constitution or all the laws enacted pursuant thereto, but each patriotic citizen who loves his Government believes in its Constitution and laws. The same is true of our local government. While we may not agree with all the provisions of each State constitution or the legislation enacted, still it is the fundamental law of each State and the laws enacted by the people of the State for the government of its entire citizenship.

Now, the legislation that is good for one is good for the entire citizenship; and when you segregate a small minority into groups, styled "chartered communities", you poison them against their State constitution and laws by arousing anew their prejudices which we are striving to overcome.

This does not mean that jurisdiction is not retained in the Federal Government to properly protect the rights and property of restricted Indians. That power is retained in the Federal Constitution and in all enabling acts admitting to statehood the several States. Congress throughout the 145 years of our existence has exercised the right to legislate for the benefit of the Indian wards of the Nation. This has been done throughout the entire continuance of our Government. Congress continues to protect the rights and property of restricted Indians, and should do so. It is not necessary, however, to protect the rights and property of Indians to have special ordinances enacted for the benefit of chartered groups, so as to place them under different laws from the other citizens of that community. I have no sympathy with title 1 of the Wheeler-Howard bill and cannot vote for it. It creates suspicion and poisons the Indians against their local governments, of which they are a part.

Title 2 is entitled "Special Education for Indians." By reference to the Interior Department appropriation bill it will be found that Congress has appropriated $16,350,185 for Indians, and of this amount $7,990,560 is appropriated for Indian education and $3,239,595 for health work. The money for Indian education is expended in two classes of boarding schools, known as "reservation" and "nonreservation", of which there are 54 boarding schools, and through the payment of tuition in public schools throughout the country and the maintenance of separate Indian day schools, and there may be need for an increase in this appropriation. I have, as a member of the subcommittee having the responsibility of assisting in preparing and reporting the Interior Department appropriation bill, urged the use of the full capacity of all boarding schools for at least another 10 years, so that the Indians may be encouraged to attend them and submit to and respect their discipline, so that they may be prepared to return to their several communities and assume their full responsibility of citizenship.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has insisted on a larger number attending the public schools. To my mind this action cannot be reconciled. If you segregate the Indians into chartered communities, encourage them to make and enforce their own laws, and live separate and apart from the white population, they become prejudiced against the white public schools, and, of course, cannot be induced to attend.

Permit me to say that I have always taken the position that the Government of the United States should be generous toward its Indian wards, both in preparing them through boarding schools and, when economic conditions permit, through public schools, to accept full responsibility of citizenship. If the appropriations are not adequate, they should be increased by Congress, and not have the Indians segregated into separate communities and taught to have suspicion against and despise their local governments, of which they must in the end become a part. The Congress has appropriated this year every dollar estimated for and recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. For health work the amount was increased.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I merely wished to state that personally I have received a great many protests against the bill which the gentleman is discussing, protests from my constituents, particularly from members of the Christian Reformed Church, an institution which has done a great deal of work among the Indians, and is greatly interested in them. I am very glad, indeed, to have the gentleman analyze the bill, for I realize he is an authority on the question.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the gentleman very much; and if the gentleman will do me the kindness to read this speech in the RECORD, he will find I have carefully analyzed the bill. I have spent considerable time and study on the provisions of this bill. I believe I can claim that I am fairly familiar with it.

Mr. MAPES. I may say to the gentleman that I intend to do as he suggests; and I also intend to send a copy of today's RECORD containing the gentleman's speech to a good many of my constituents.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the gentleman.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mrs. GREENWAY. As a member of the committee, I agree with every word the gentleman from Oklahoma has said, and I hope the gentleman finishes his analysis. Last night many of us redrafted the bill, leaving nothing in it but the title; but I hope the gentleman continues his analysis of the original bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the gentlewoman from Arizona. I know she has given a great deal of time, thought, and study to the provisions of this bill.

Title III is entitled "Indian lands", and, without analyzing it in detail, it authorizes an appropriation of $2,000,000 annually with which to buy additional lands for the use and benefit of members of the respective chartered communities. I have indicated, and I repeat now, that I am in sympathy with the purchase of additional lands for indigent, landless, and homeless Indians. Congress has appropriated money on a number of occasions to purchase lands for the landless Indians in California. There is no reason why this policy should not be enlarged and extended to other Indian tribes. I therefore favor the authorization of a sufficient amount of money to be appropriated by Congress which would be adequate to buy lands for those Indians who could be induced to go upon and beneficially use them in the form of Indian subsistence homesteads, with the title to remain in the United States and the land to be used for the benefit of the Indians subject to the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior. This is along the line of subsistence-homestead legislation enacted by Congress for the benefit of those who live in industrial centers and who are unable to find sufficient work at all times to maintain themselves and the members of their families. Under that legislation it is contemplated that the land and the improvements thereon will ultimately be paid for by the occupant. However, with the Indians it may be necessary to change or have a different policy as to terms of payment. The title to the land should be held in the United States. It should be made nontaxable, of course, while held by the Government, but it may and should be necessary to contribute to the expense of the local State government because of the nontaxability of these lands. It should be held for the beneficial use of the Indians under well-thought-out legislation as to details. Funds would have to be made available to aid in the improvement of the land, including houses and other improvements, the purchase of livestock, the reduction of the land to a state of cultivation, and to otherwise temporarily assist the Indians in making a living. This would not require a separate form of government for any Indian community. He should be taught to love and respect and have confidence in his local self-government. The Federal Government should provide, as it does, Indian farmers and social workers, and perhaps the number should be increased, to live among the Indians on the Indian subsistence homesteads and to aid them in every possible way; but this would not require the setting up of a new government, the adoption of a constitution and laws by a chartered community, and encourage the members of that community to have a distrust and an aversion for their State government.

It is urged that the employees of an Indian community should be largely Indian. I am in sympathy with that suggestion. This could be done by amending the civil-service laws. I have always insisted that more Indians who could speak the language of the respective tribes should be employed, men and women, who are in sympathy with the members of the tribes, and who live their lives, instead of employing those from the eligible list of graduates from eastern colleges, but who have no practical knowledge of Indian affairs and who of necessity are not in as deep and continued sympathy with the Indians whom they serve. This would not require the chartering of a community.

Let me repeat that I favor any adequate appropriation to buy lands for the support of landless and homeless Indians, whether they were improvidently dispossessed of their lands or whether they were born since the lands were alloted, and therefore not enrolled. However, I think that the use of these lands should be confined to restricted Indians of one half or more Indian blood. If they are of less than that degree of blood they should be classed as other citizens and made to take advantage of the general laws with reference to subsistence homesteads. The great and continuing obligation of this Government, legal and moral, is to supervise and take care of the restricted Indian of one half or more Indian blood, and protect him and his property rights until he is able to stand alone and to accept the full responsibility of citizenship. However, I would not take from him the hope that he would become competent, that he would not always be an inferior. The Indians are a proud race of people. They recognize no inferiority. They point with pride to some of the leading men and women whom they have produced. It is, therefore, humiliating to enact legislation that would not ultimately look forward to and indulge the hope of release of the Indian from all governmental supervision and guardianship. You cannot fully develop any men or women, Indian or white, by constantly reminding them of their incapacity to accept the full responsibility of citizenship and their inability to take part in their local self-government.

I heartily agree that additional appropriations should be made for health work among the Indians. Only a few years ago the Indians were greatly prejudiced against being treated by white doctors. They resorted to Indian remedies. They could not be induced to go to hospitals. They would not accept the services of white physicians. This has greatly changed in the past 10 years. Practically every member of every tribe is now glad to enter hospitals provided by the Government and practically all the hospitals throughout the entire country are attended by Indians. Their prejudices against treatment in hospitals has been overcome. It has been quite a struggle but it is another step in the advancement of the Indian race. I favor making adequate appropriations for more health work among the Indians. Now that their lands are allotted and they are not able to live in the open, and many are undernourished and more subject to attack by various diseases, particularly tuberculosis, they need more medical treatment and health supervision. I think the duty is clear that Congress should make larger appropriations for this purpose.

Title IV provides for a court of Indian affairs composed of a chief justice and six associate justices. Indian courts are to be presided over by one of these justices. Jurisdiction of this court is defined in section 3 of title IV of the bill and provides for prosecution of crimes against the United States committed in the Indian area in any Indian community, whether or not committed by an Indian; of all cases at law and equity arising out of commerce of any Indian tribe; of all cases arising under the laws or ordinances of an Indian community; of all actions involving the rights of any person in whole or part of Indian blood or descent; of all cases involving heirs and settlement of estates of such Indians, including partition of Indian lands, guardianships of minors and incompetent Indians. To my mind, this is unthinkable.

We have State courts in each county throughout the United States and we have Federal courts in every State. Under all of the laws and treaties, any case involving the rights of a restricted Indian or his property may be transferred from a State to a Federal court. I have never heard of any criticism to the effect that a Federal court has not always been sympathetic toward a restricted Indian. It is inconceivable to my mind that Congress could be induced to enact such legislation. There is no necessity for it; it is not beneficial to the restricted Indian in protecting him and his property rights. It only serves to prejudice him further not only against the State courts but also against the Federal courts.

This would be a great additional expense to the United States and would necessitate the appointment of judges with a salary of $7,500 per annum, additional attorneys, court employees, and the assembling of juries, and the holding of special terms of court—where these same cases could be tried either in the State courts or in the Federal courts. The law in Oklahoma requires that where property of restricted Indians is in litigation, in order that the final decision may be binding on the Indian and the Government, notice must be served on the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes, and if it is thought that for any reason it is desirable, upon the filing of a motion, the case is automatically transferred to the Federal court. I have not heard of a decision of a Federal court in Oklahoma where it was contended that the rights of the Indians were not fully protected. I grant you that in some cases they may not have been properly prepared, or the pleadings may not in all cases have properly presented the issues, and courts may have been compelled to decide questions on side issues, but I have never heard it charged in Oklahoma that the interests of the Indians have not been protected when those interests have been properly presented to the Federal courts.

For years I was Cherokee tribal attorney. I tried many suits for them. I never had occasion to transfer any suit from a State to a Federal court. I know of no case, of the many that I have tried for them, where I believe that the Indian was not dealt as fairly with as if the case were being tried in the Federal courts. However, if it is felt that there are any communities where there may be local prejudice against the Indians, those cases can and should be transferred to the Federal courts. Congress appropriates money for probate attorneys, and they are charged with the responsibility of appearing for and defending the property rights of all restricted Indians. They are assisted in the Federal courts also by the United States district attorneys. I assert, therefore, that it is unthinkable that the Congress should favorably consider such a provision as this bill contains to create separate Indian courts.

Let me recapitulate in order to emphasize that I do not think the self-government features contained in title I of this bill are necessary. I favor adequate appropriations for the purchase of land for old, indigent, landless, and homeless Indians for Indian subsistence homesteads, the title to remain in the Government of the United States and be administered under general rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior for the beneficial use of such Indians.

I favor adequate appropriations for boarding and Indian day schools and for the payment of tuition, by the Government, of Indian children in attendance upon public schools.

I earnestly favor additional and adequate appropriations for health work in the Indian Service and regard this as most urgent.

I favor enlarged appropriations that will be adequate to increase the number of employees in the Indian Service who are assisting restricted Indians in finding gainful employment. The Government has a duty toward its Indian wards to assist them in finding employment and to teach the Indian to conserve his property and to abide by and comply with the State and Federal laws.

I have always favored the employment of Indians who are competent and honest in the Indian Service, regardless of civil-service rules and regulations. In the event lands are purchased for Indians and administered as subsistence homesteads, those employed to assist the Indians in the cultivation of their lands, the harvesting of their crops, and the caring for their livestock should be Indians who live among them and speak the language and who are in sympathy with them.

We should assist the Indian in every way to earn a living and to qualify him to assume the full responsibility of citizenship and encourage him to take part in his local and State governments. We should inspire confidence in every Indian in his Government, because in the end he is destined to take his place along the side of his white neighbor and to become a part of the Government and to rely upon the protection of its laws. Most, if not all, restricted Indians have unrestricted relatives against whom this legislation would create a prejudice.

The bill since it was originally introduced has been modified and amended by both committees of the House and the Senate, and while many of the features which I have discussed have been eliminated, the bill in its present form contains objectionable features which should prevent its favorable consideration by Congress. I want to discuss the amended bill.

Section 2 of the amended bill would take away from the Secretary of the Interior authority to remove the restrictions on lands allotted to individual Indians, although the Indian may thereafter become a college graduate and move off the land to a distant State. Are we through legislation to close the door of hope against every Indian's becoming competent to manage his affairs? Under these circumstances no disposition could be made of the land.

Section 4 of the revised bill provides—

> No sale, devise, gift, exchange, or transfer by operation of law or otherwise of restricted Indian lands shall be made or approved.

And then follows a proviso that such lands may be sold, devised, or otherwise transferred to an Indian tribe or member thereof with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, which, in my judgment, is intended to repeal the partition jurisdiction of the courts of the several States, including that of Oklahoma, and vest this authority to partition exclusively in the Secretary of the Interior. Interest in land is of no value unless there is a definite procedure through the courts whereby the interest in the land may be ascertained and disposed of as a matter of right, and not subject to the arbitrary power vested in the Secretary of the Interior and, in fact, exercised by a subordinate official.

Section 7 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to proclaim new Indian reservations on lands acquired under the act or add such lands to existing reservations. Under this section authority is granted the Secretary to acquire any number of separate tracts of land and create Indian reservations, and these Indian reservations would be given the power, conferred by sections 9 and 10, to adopt constitutions and to perform other functions of government enumerated under these sections. This provision is unnecessary.

Section 9 provides for the adoption of a constitution and bylaws by three fifths of those voting at an election, which may confer the following rights and powers: To employ legal counsel, subject, as in all other cases, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; to prevent the sale, disposition, lease, or encumbrance of tribal lands, interest in lands, or other tribal assets. These are broad powers and may amend or repeal existing law. The language is ambiguous and its interpretation is doubtful. How this language may affect the coal or asphalt lands in Oklahoma, which may be included in a reservation, is doubtful and there should be definite and specific language used, so that it may be incapable of misinterpretation. This section is dangerous and should not be incorporated in the law.

In connection with section 9, section 10 should be considered, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a charter of incorporation; and this charter is to be ratified by three-fifths vote of all adult Indians "resident within the territory specified in the charter." The powers and functions of this corporation shall be "to take hold, manage, operate, and dispose of all the collective and other corporate assets and property of every description, both real and personal, and to do such other things as are needed for the conduct of its business, except that no authority is granted to sell any of the land included within the limits of the reservation. Such charter shall not be revoked or surrendered except by act of Congress."

In the event the coal and asphalt lands in the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations, or any part of them, were included within a reservation and a charter granted, it is extremely doubtful whether or not this provision may not authorize the management and operation of these coal and asphalt mines.

Section 11 of the amended bill authorizes that an appropriation of $250,000 in any fiscal year be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in defraying the expenses of tribal organizations created under the act.

Section 12 authorizes an appropriation out of the Treasury of the sum of $10,000,000 and establishes a revolving fund from which the Secretary of the Interior may make loans to Indian chartered corporations or their members.

Section 13 authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to provide technical education for qualified Indians. As a member of the subcommittee charged with the responsibility of making appropriations, I made every effort to have the capacity of Indian boarding schools maintained for all Indians—not a few—where they may have the advantages of higher technical training.

Section 14 authorizes the Secretary to establish standards for employees, which, of course, means doing away with civil-service requirements. I do not object to this provision, as I believe that practical knowledge of Indians and sympathy with them will enable Indian employees to give more beneficial service.

Section 19 defines an Indian to be of one half Indian blood, but it has doubtful language because it includes not only Indians on a reservation and descendants of Indians but includes "all other persons of one half or more Indian blood." This may enable claimants from Maine to California to assert rights under this proposed bill.

Again permit me to call attention to the definition of the word "tribe" which is defined in section 19 as follows: "The term 'tribe' wherever used in this act shall be construed to refer to any Indian tribe, band, nation, pueblo, or other native political group or organization."

Note the word "organization", which is included in the definition of "tribe" and connect it up with sections 7, 9, and 10 and no interpretation can be placed upon it other than that a chartered community would be recognized as a tribe and may exercise all the powers given to a tribe under sections 9 and 10. This is dangerous legislation, even in its revised form, and should not be enacted into law.

Distrust of local self-government is evidenced by H.R. 8174 prepared and introduced at the request of the Indian Bureau.

This bill, which is a companion bill, would continue the restrictions and nontaxability of restricted Indian lands of the Five Civilized Tribes, including those hereafter purchased with restricted funds, or from appropriations by Congress, indefinitely and "until otherwise provided by Congress", and gives the Secretary of the Interior complete supervision over them, with a proviso against leasing such lands for any period, except with the approval of the Secretary.

It provides for designating the Secretary as trustee in a declaration of trust, and makes the same irrevocable, except with the approval of the Secretary, and gives the Secretary complete supervision over such funds.

It repeals the provisions of the act of May 27, 1908, authorizing the appointment of guardians, and provides that hereafter no appointment of a guardian of a restricted Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes, enrolled or unenrolled, shall be made by the State court, except in the determination of any pending case where a guardian is necessary, which may be made only upon the recommendation of the superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes.

It repeals the act of June 14, 1918, and places the determination of heirs, probate of wills, and partition of restricted lands, under the jurisdiction of the Secretary, and his decision is final and conclusive.

No will of any restricted Indian devising any restricted property is valid unless approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

In short, this bill would take from the State courts practically all jurisdiction over the restricted Indians and their property, including the approval and probation of wills, the determination of heirs, and partition of lands, and transfers it to the Secretary of the Interior. There breathes through every line of this bill a suspicion and a distrust for the local courts and local government in Oklahoma and encourages the belief in the Indians that they cannot look for protection under them.

One bill (H.R. 7902) would, through the provisions of a charter granted by the Secretary of the Interior, encourage local self-government to, for the most part, non-English-speaking groups of Indians, result in the complete domination of all Indian tribes by the Indian Office, and the second bill—H.R. 8174—would take away from the local State courts and government of Oklahoma, all jurisdiction and authority over them and substitute long-distance government.

I am determined, so far as my action goes, that the Indians of this Nation shall not, through segregation into separate groups, be ultimately destroyed by prejudices created against their white neighbors with whom they should live in harmony and on terms of absolute equality.

The Government owes a duty to its Indian wards to protect them in their property rights, to see that their land is beneficially used and not improvidently encumbered or disposed of, to provide a forum for the speedy adjustment of their claims, to assist in their education so as to enable them to compete with their white neighbors, to supervise health work among them, to extend aid to the aged, indigent, and helpless, and to assist in finding employment for the able-bodied men and women.

In these distressing times men and women of every nationality in every county in the Nation could be assembled and induced to endorse resolutions for their support out of the Federal Treasury if they were led to believe by an official holding a responsible Government position that such legislation would receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

Is it any wonder that non-English-speaking Indians, under the leadership and direction of Government employees, should accept such assurances and pass resolutions endorsing a bill which neither they understand nor any subordinate Government employee is capable of explaining?

I appreciate that the views I have expressed may be misrepresented through the means of wide publicity which the sponsors of the legislation have through press releases, wide newspaper publicity, radio addresses, and by personal contact through intimidated Government employees.

In the years that have come and gone I have spent many wakeful hours studying the Indian problem in an effort to be of real constructive service to the Indians, not only of my own tribe but all Indians of my State and throughout the Nation. Believing that this legislation, for the reasons I have indicated, will not be beneficial to nor result in the advancement of the Indians, I must have the courage to speak the truth. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 7 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I understand that we were going on with this bill today? Of course, the responsibility rests with the majority.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the majority leader is not on the floor at this minute; but, of course, it was the expectation to go forward at once with the consideration of this rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I inquire what the gentleman is going to talk about?

Mr. CROWE. I am going to speak on the matter of a bill which I introduced yesterday, being H.R. 9696.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think we ought to go ahead with the pending business, and therefore I am obliged to object.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—HARVEY O. WILLIS (H.DOC. NO. 377)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H.R. No. 3553, "An act for the relief of Harvey O. Willis."

This bill provides that in the administration of laws conferring rights, priveleges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Harvey O. Willis, who was an enlisted man in the Army of the United States, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service on July 19, 1898, provided that no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of the act. The effect of the bill is to make Willis eligible to receive such pension and other benefits as he may be entitled to from the date of its approval.

The official records of the War Department show that Willis enlisted in the United States Army August 18, 1897, and was discharged without honor on July 22, 1898, by order of the Secretary of War, for the reason that "he had been twice tried by summary court for excessive use of intoxicants, that he became intoxicated at every opportunity; that he was the victim of chronic alcoholism; that any further attempt to reform him appeared to be hopeless, and that his presence in the company was detrimental to the discipline of the organization."

I do not think that this discreditable record should be negatived alone on the ground of Willis' sworn statement that it does not represent the true reasons for his discharge without honor. I am constrained, therefore, to withhold my approval of this bill as I do not feel that the beneficiary thereof is entitled to be accorded the same rights and privileges given to other members of our military forces as a reward for honest and faithful service.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 21, 1934.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message of the President and the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—SILVER (S.DOC. NO. 181)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Ways and Means Committee and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

On January 11, 1934, I recommended to the Congress legislation which was promptly enacted under the title "The Gold Reserve Act of 1934." This act vested in the United States Government the custody and control of our stocks of gold as a reserve for our paper currency and as a medium of settling international balances. It set up a stabilization fund for the control of foreign exchange in the interests of our people, and certain amendments were added to facilitate the acquisition of silver.

As stated in my message to the Congress, this legislation was recommended as a step in improving our financial and monetary system. Its enactment has laid a foundation on which we are organizing a currency system that will be both sound and adequate. It is a long step forward, but only a step.

As a part of the larger objective, some things have been clear. One is that we should move forward as rapidly as conditions permit in broadening the metallic base of our monetary system and in stabilizing the purchasing and debt-paying power of our money on a more equitable level. Another is that we should not neglect the value of an increased use of silver in improving our monetary system. Since 1929 that has been obvious.

Some measures for making a greater use of silver in the public interest are appropriate for independent action by us. On others, international cooperation should be sought.

Of the former class is that of increasing the proportion of silver in the abundant metallic reserves back of our paper currency. This policy was initiated by the proclamation of December 21, 1933, bringing our current domestic production of silver into the Treasury, as well as placing this Nation among the first to carry out the agreement on silver which we sought and secured at the London Conference. We have since acquired other silver in the interest of stabilization of foreign exchange and the development of a broader metallic base for our currency. We seek to remedy a maladjustment of our currency.

In further aid of this policy, it would be helpful to have legislation broadening the authority for the further acquisition and monetary use of silver.

I, therefore, recommend legislation at the present session declaring it to be the policy of the United States to increase the amount of silver in our monetary stocks, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of their monetary value in silver and three fourths in gold.

The Executive authority should be authorized and directed to make the purchases of silver necessary to attain this ultimate objective.

The authority to purchase present accumulations of silver in this country should be limited to purchases at not in excess of 50 cents per ounce.

The Executive authority should be enabled, should circumstances require, to take over present surpluses of silver in this country not required for industrial uses on payment of just compensation, and to regulate imports, exports, and other dealings in monetary silver.

There should be a tax of at least 50 percent on the profits accruing from dealing in silver.

We can proceed with this program of increasing our store of silver for use as a part of the metallic reserves for our paper currency without seriously disturbing adjustments in world trade. However, because of the great world supply of silver and its use in varying forms by the world's population, concerted action by all nations, or at least a large group of nations, is necessary if a permanent measure of value, including both gold and silver, is eventually to be made a world standard. To arrive at that point, we must seek every possibility for world agreement, although it may turn out that this Nation will ultimately have to take such independent action on this phase of the matter as its interests require.

The success of the London conference in consummating an international agreement on silver, which has now been ratified by all the governments concerned, makes such further agreement worth seeking. The ebb and flow of values in almost all parts of the world have created many points of pressure for readjustments of internal and international standards. At no time since the efforts of this Nation to secure international agreement on silver began in 1878 have conditions been more favorable for making progress along this line.

Accordingly, I have begun to confer with some of our neighbors in regard to the use of both silver and gold, preferably on a coordinated basis, as a standard of monetary value. Such an agreement would constitute an important step forward toward a monetary unit of value more equitable and stable in its purchasing and debt-paying power.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 22, 1934.

LOANS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 388 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 388

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3487, a bill relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute amendment and any other amendments recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a very brief statement in presenting this resolution. Other members of the Committee on Rules have requested some little time in the consideration of the resolution, and in that connection I shall yield the usual 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] on the minority side.

It will not be my purpose to undertake to go into a discussion of the merits of this bill or the provisions of the bill. In a general way, I imagine all Members of the House are familiar with its purposes. It is, of course, universally regarded as a measure of very great importance because of the fact that it contains provisions as incorporated in the bill for the extension of loans to the smaller industries of the country and affords to them an avenue of credit for their rehabilitation and the employment of those who are not now employed through agencies that are not now open to them under existing law.

I regard this bill as one that will contribute essentially to the economic rehabilitation of the country. That is at least the hope of the sponsors of this bill and of the administration, which has recommended in principle the enactment of the bill.

The rule is an open one and provides that the substitute of the House committee may be considered as the original bill for amendment when it is read in lieu of the Senate bill. You will note that the Committee on Banking and Currency in the consideration of this matter struck out all the provisions of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and has proposed for your consideration a committee amendment from the Banking and Currency Committee. There will be 2 hours of general debate on the bill and then full consideration under the 5-minute rule.

Unless there are some questions, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this bill providing for loans to industry I consider one of the most important measures which we have taken up in this session of Congress. When we passed the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, I opposed amendments which were offered and adopted permitting that Corporation to lend to private industry. That bill, as we all know, was vetoed by President Hoover for the reason of the inclusion of such a provision. I felt at that time that if the Government lent its money to the principal lending agencies of the Nation, such as banks, insurance companies, mortgage companies, and similar institutions, that the money would filter down to industry and the small borrower. I could not then endorse the proposal that Uncle Sam conduct a "pawnshop", as someone said, or that the Government become the only lending agency in the Nation. But that theory of mine and others have not worked out satisfactorily. So this legislation now becomes necessary.

I do not pretend to know all the details of the administration of the R.F.C., but probably a billion and a half dollars has been loaned to the great "lending" institutions of our country, the banks, the insurance companies, and the mortgage companies. The sad fact is, however, and this is one of the most cruel experiences that we have gone through for 2 years, that these great "lending" agencies have not done their part to take our people out of this depression. They have taken the Government money and have placed it in their vaults, thus making themselves liquid, in some instances almost 100 percent, without passing on the money to the needy business man. I know from my own experience in the city of New York, of many an industry which could not get a vehicle or carrier, such as a bank or mortgage company, through which to borrow the money which they needed in order to put men to work, or to provide working capital, or to extend their business during the depression. They could not get any bank, mortgage company, or insurance company to lend them money, although they offered the very best security.

I know industries that could not finance their pay rolls on orders from the soundest companies in America, such as the Standard Oil, which was the best collateral and the best guaranty. The banks, however, preferred to keep the cash in their vaults.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. What the gentleman states is exactly true, according to my knowledge and experience of the situation, but is it not a fact that the banks have a definite alibi in the matter in that the Treasury, through the itinerant bank examiner, has refused to O.K. any loans to industry? At least, this is my information.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know that to be the fact.

We do know that the insurance companies and the mortgage companies have not done their part, the best proof of which is the fact that we have had to pass the Farm Owners' Loan Corporation Act and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act, so that our home owners and our farmers could obtain mortgages from the Government when the great organizations like the insurance companies and the mortgage companies took the cash from the R.F.C. and placed it in their vaults, in direct violation of the principal of the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

For years we have been struggling with this problem of obtaining loans for industry. For instance, Mr. Speaker, if the United States Steel Corporation, which employs countless thousands of men, needed money for its pay roll and no bank or insurance company or similar institution would finance it, it could not get a direct loan from the Government, although the employment and the livelihood of so many people were at stake, and companies of responsibility not as big as United States Steel have found themselves in the same position. Companies with a background of 100 or 150 years have not been able to get any bank or insurance company or any mortgage company to finance them on the very best security. The fundamental purpose of this bill is to provide employment. Private lenders have failed to do their patriotic duty, so the Government must now step in.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I notice the House committee has stricken out the Senate bill and has improved upon it, I think, and reported a much better bill. Will the Members of the House have an opportunity to express their preference for the House bill by any kind of vote, in order that we may let the other body know just exactly how we stand on these two bills? How will this come up under the rule? I should like for the other body to know that we are opposed to giving the Federal Reserve banks a bonus of $140,000,000 under the guise of helping industry.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The committee, as I understand, will offer their substitute as an amendment.

Mr. PATMAN. And then we can have a division vote?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the committee substitute was voted down, that action would restore the Senate bill, of course.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the thought of offering an amendment to the rule which has been reported and is now under consideration making in order any amendment offered by any Member of the House rather than leaving it entirely within the control of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is mistaken about the purport of the rule.

Mr. COX. No; as I understand the rule, no amendment is in order unless it be accepted by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is not the fact. The provision to which the gentleman refers makes amendments offered by the committee in order even though they may not be germane, but any Member of the House or of the Committee of the Whole may offer an amendment at any time provided, of course, it is germane under the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will yield there, I may say that that is in perfect harmony with the general procedure of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; this bill is brought in under the general rules of the House, but any committee amendment, particularly the substitute bill, is made in order to avoid any possible question of germaneness.

May I say now that I hope the committee, before it completes its consideration of this bill, will increase the aggregate amount of the loan that may be made to any one person of $100,000 to some higher figure.

I appreciate the general and praiseworthy desire to spread this money throughout the country, and I also know that three or four hundred million dollars will not go very far, but $100,000 will not go very far to a concern, for instance, with net assets of a million dollars. I should like to see the maximum placed at $500,000 or at least $250,000. The House surely understands that this bill does not appropriate new money. This money is already down there in the R.F.C. and has not been used to date. I understand the Senate bill made $1,000,000 as the limit of any one loan. This may be too high, but I should like to see the limit made $500,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman introduced his statement with the remark that this legislation is for small industries.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know that I said "small."

Mr. COX. Well, for the smaller industries; if the amount available for any one loan should be increased to $500,000, then only 600 lenders could borrow if they secured the maximum amount; and if the measure is for the smaller industries, does not the gentleman think that the sum so available should be reduced from $100,000 to $50,000 or $20,000, in order that the spread may be greater?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The $300,000,000 is more or less of a revolving fund; and while a loan may be made for 5 years, there will be money coming in from time to time.

I understand the committee is including fishing as an industry, as proposed in the bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]; and I presume to compliment them for this, because one of our neglected industries has been the fishing industry which could not get a loan and which has not even been classed as an "industry." It is difficult to understand what the R.F.C. thought it was. The fishing industry now may obtain loans under this bill, like any other industry.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. HAINES. Does the bill refer to any particular industry, or is it general in its scope?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is general, as I understand it.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and I am through.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and many other Members of the House have been very active in trying to induce the committee to offer an amendment permitting the R.F.C. to lend up to $75,000,000 to school districts in the United States for the purpose of paying teachers' salaries, some of whom have not been paid for 11 or 12 months, I understand.

The Illinois delegation has had conferences with many people in high positions in Washington with reference to that amendment. I believe it is unfortunate that the committee did not bring in that amendment as part of the bill or as a committee amendment. The reason the rule contains the language as to points of order is to provide for just such an amendment offered by the committee. The R.F.C. will not and cannot loan to any school district unless there is good security for the loan. The R.F.C. will determine in each instance whether or not the school district has good and adequate security for the money loaned.

I do hope that after due consideration the committee will offer such an amendment; and if the committee does not, I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will offer the amendment, and I also hope that the Chair will hold as I believe that the amendment is germane. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker and Members, I am for this rule and the legislation which it makes in order.

I am in favor of this legislation which has for its object the worthy purpose of revitalizing some of the sick industries of the country. Everybody realizes that the ten millions of unemployed people must eventually have their problem solved through work obtained in private industry. The Federal Treasury has been generous, but it cannot indefinitely continue to carry the burden.

Therefore, it appears to me it is good, sound business sense to direct our efforts to breathe life into some of the industries which have found it difficult to operate because of lack of capital. Their surplus has been exhausted through the struggle in these years of depression. Banks are frequently unable or unwilling to extend industrial loans, with the result that the concern lacks the money necessary to purchase the raw materials and take care of the pay rolls when the goods are being processed and prepared for market. This lack of capital deprives many workmen of the opportunity of securing employment in their normal vocation, and consequently the relief rolls of the municipality where the concern is located obtain many recruits.

The Government has been obliged to pour vast sums into the relief funds, money which can never be returned. This was necessary. I believe we can well afford to attempt the experiment of trying to put people to work through their natural channel. It is on this front that the victory must eventually be won, and, personally, I believe we can bring about genuine and much permanent relief in this way.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is correct; but is it not a fact that the past administration, through the bank examiners, has been the cause of not making these loans to industry. Is not that the main reason why the banks have not loaned to industry?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman has made a statement that I cannot confirm. I understand quite frequently the bank examiner has come to the bank and said, "You must not make this class of loans, because your bank must be kept liquid." The bank examiner has required them to maintain a degree of liquidity which has prevented the granting of many industrial and real-estate loans.

Mr. CULKIN. Assuming that was the policy of the past and present administration——

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not admit that it was the policy of the past or of the present administration; I believe it was the rules of the bank examiners.

Mr. CULKIN. Assuming that is true, is it not time to change it?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not know how you are going to change the policy of the bank examiners. Certainly we cannot do it here now.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the bill provide any loans for new industry or simply for industries now established?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is my opinion it does not provide for loans to a new industry. As I understand it, the purpose, as defined, is to keep old industries functioning.

Recent efforts toward helping industry have been practically of no value. The machinery has been too cumbersome, and the journey toward the goal of achievement has been too long. Most applicants have given up in despair before the final decision was reached, and in many instances the delay has caused the concern to miss the opportunity.

I am pleased to see this liberalizing of the opportunity for industry to secure the necessary capital for their needs, and that in the future the loans may be placed direct and without passing through mortgage-loan companies.

Personally, I believe, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], the $100,000 limitation is too low and should be substantially increased. This would be too small a loan to help many industries which are in a position to put thousands to work if they get the required capital. I hope the amount will be increased before the bill is finally passed, or, at least, increased in conference.

This legislation, I believe, is an intelligent effort to put people back to work and I am glad to endorse it. I believe it will, if wisely administered, cost the Treasury very little and will help the taxpayers by reducing the money needed for relief purposes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I do not propose to discuss the rule. I wish to say just a few words preliminary to general debate upon the bill. I think there has been something of a misunderstanding as to the actual situation which led up to the presenting of this bill to the Congress. In our banking system we have the commercial banks and the savings banks and trust companies. In none of those banks is there any power to extend long-term loans to industry. The commercial banks from the very necessities of their situation must confine their accommodations to industries to short-term credits in general not exceeding 90-day loans. There is such a pressing necessity upon these commercial banks at all times for liquidity that they cannot with safety either to themselves or to the industrial structure which they serve tie up their loans to industry in long-term obligations. This gap in our banking system has existed for a long time. This bill seeks to fill it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] complained of the rules which the bank examiners have laid down. It is true that bank examiners have insisted that these commercial banks could not tie their loans up in long-term credits. They have pressed them on all sides to keep liquid. That has been particularly true since the fall of 1929. These banks are very liquid today; in fact, they are not able to make enough short-term loans at 6 percent return, I think I am safe in saying in the majority of instances, to pay their overhead. Hence they have had to resort to the purchase of short-term Treasury obligations, in the purchase of bills of exchange, and bankers' acceptances, yielding a very small return. The banks are struggling under this difficult situation to pay their own way today. At the same time industry suffers for lack of working capital which it desires on long-term loans. This bill would extend the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve banks so that they can make 5-year loans to industry.

The R.F.C. may lend not in excess of $300,000,000 in this manner, and the Federal Reserve banks may lend a sum not in excess of their surplus, or $148,000,000.

Under the terms of the bill these loans may not be made to any industry which was not in existence on January 1, 1934, and they may not be made in any one instance in excess of $100,000. I am aware there will be some difference of opinion as to the advisability of such a limitation, but let me say that the aim of the committee was to write this bill in terms to accommodate the smaller industries. If you gentlemen amend this bill and increase that limit, you will cut down the possibilities as to the number of loans which may be made to small industries. We thought it was best for the little fellow who has been hit particularly hard of late, to hold loans down to $100,000, so that no big fellow could come in and take up an undue amount of this money available for long-term loans.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. COX. Will not the interest of small business be improved by a reduction of the amount rather than by increasing it?

Mr. BEEDY. Well, I think that is true. If you are going to change this limit, if you want to help the little fellow I think you had better cut it rather than increase it.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has proved to be one of our best recovery facilities. It has stood the test of time; and although there have been complaints as to the way in which the loans have been made, those complaints arose, for the most part, upon the unwillingness of this corporation to be more liberal with its loans. On the whole, I think the R.F.C. has done a highly commendable piece of work.

I regret exceedingly that in this bill we have been forced, for one reason or another, to bring the Federal Reserve banks into this picture. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has a set-up which enables it to make these contemplated loans. If we would liberalize the restrictions which we originally imposed upon the loaning power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, that institution would be able to bring effective aid to industry. But, in my opinion, there ought not to be two competitive Government agencies in the same field. I apprehend that one result of setting up the proposed dual lending agency will be that one industry will run to one agency and get its best terms and take up its time and then run to the other agency and say, "Now, we have been offered this and that, but we want so-and-so from you." Thus more time will be consumed and there will be dickering back and forth between those two institutions. I regret it. It seems to me it will subject the Government to additional unnecessary expense in a double set-up for the same purposes. I repeat that I wish we might write liberal provisions into the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so that it might make its loans not on "full and adequate consideration" based on present values, but that it might be empowered to make loans on a more liberal basis and thus accommodate industry. The Federal Reserve banks, 12 in number, which were never designed to do business with any individual or any person, but were banks of issue or rediscount to deal with other banks, ought never, in my opinion, to be put into the lending business. It is a perversion of the original purpose for which those banks were established. I regret it very deeply. However, the bill provides that both the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve banks may make loans to industry on a liberal basis.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not true that in the present legislative situation it is necessary that the House and Senate should accept both propositions?

Mr. BEEDY. I am afraid that is so. However, I do not like to subscribe to the principle that it is necessary for a deliberative body, the representatives of a free people, to be driven into accepting any unsound principle of legislation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I dislike the situation which seems to require the passage of legislation such as is involved in this bill, but the credit condition of the country is such that it seems desirable to do so. The bill which this rule seeks to make in order authorizes loans to industry under certain conditions and is reported unanimously by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am supporting the rule and expect to support the legislation.

I rise particularly to say a word in behalf of an amendment, which I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] intends to offer during the consideration of the legislation involving the provisions of H.R. 9465, which authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, out of the funds of the corporation, upon full and adequate security, to loan money to school districts organized pursuant to State law for the purpose of payment of teachers' salaries.

It has seemed to me that our schools and the teaching profession have been required to share an undue part of the depression through which we have been passing, and that they have been obliged to bear an undue burden during the depression. While we are making loans to industry we may well authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to school districts upon adequate security in order to keep their schools open in some cases, and in other cases to pay somewhere near adequate salaries to their teachers. Our schools and our children of school age ought not to be made to suffer any more than is absolutely necessary, and when the Federal Government is helping people in so many different ways it should give some attention to helping our schools where they really need help.

I expect to be engaged in the conference committee on the stock-exchange legislation during the debate this afternoon, but I wanted to anticipate the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to express my approval of it and to express the hope that it may be incorporated as a part of this legislation.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting to compare the provisions of the House bill with the bill that was originally introduced in the Senate. One provision in the Senate bill, of course, was that the limitation on loans should be $1,000,000. The limitation in the House bill has been set at $100,000. Now come some and say it is discriminatory because it does not properly take care of a certain type or character of industry which might need a million dollars, yet I have been led to believe by all the discussion and all the publicity that has been extant upon this bill that it was a very essential bill to aid the small industries. If that is the case, I do not understand how anyone can justify an industry as a small industry which seeks to borrow up to and including $1,000,000. I am very much interested in this bill, because many queries have come to me from industries in my district with respect to the availability of money for industries that are not invested with a public interest. For instance, there are coal mines seeking to extend their shafts or to build a new tipple or to get sufficient funds with which to meet the pay roll. I have several such queries, some asking for about $60,000 and some asking for $15,000. I have an inquiry from a pottery plant which, in addition to the regular working capital, wishes also to build a new kiln, in accord with modern design and structure, so that they can reduce the overhead that now obtains in the more modern pottery plants. They do not need a million dollars; they do not need $500,000; all they need is about $65,000 or $75,000 to carry on with 125 or 150 people on the pay roll; and, as has been well pointed out, $300,000,000 that goes in chunks of $1,000,000 and $500,000 will not last very long. So if this money is to be diffused into all the localities and into all the States of the Nation, then this limitation of $100,000 must stand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. COX. What is the gentleman's reaction to the suggestion that the amount be reduced to $50,000, in the interest of increasing the spread?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would say as an alternative proposal that I would rather reduce it below $100,000 than to raise it above $100,000.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not true that the larger industries can go to the Federal Reserve Board for relief?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly.

Mr. CULKIN. And they could probably make a loan readily in that quarter where the smaller industry cannot get relief at all from the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman from New York that large industry, as a matter of fact, in view of the tremendous excess reserves that have been piled up in the banks and the Federal Reserves, have not the difficulty in obtaining loans that has been the case with small industries.

Mr. CULKIN. In addition the small industries do not have the surpluses that the large industries have.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I cannot yield further, for there is a provision in this bill to which I desire to call attention and I can do this best by illustration. After the banking legislation passed at the special session, several banks in my district were adversely affected. I went into one of them one day. There sat the conservator with his face in a book. I said: "What are you doing?"

He said: "I am studying the regulations that were gotten out by the Treasury Department."

I said: "What for?"

"Oh, well, we must have a meticulous and careful regard for the interpretation of these regulations."

Because the regulations had been so interwoven with adjectives as to what they could and could not do, there were not only one conservator, but hundreds, and perhaps thousands, who were giving a scrupulous regard to the language Congress had written in the bill, to ascertain the intention of the Congress.

The same thing is true in connection with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Great delay was experienced, particularly in my State, as a result of some of the academic and abstruse provisions that were written into the bill. Branch managers and State division managers were so carefully construing the language that too often they lost sight of the functions and the principles of the bill.

Now, it occurs to me that the best thing we can do in a bill of this kind is to strip it of all those so-called "qualifying and conditioning words and phrases" that may place some kind of limitation upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the Federal Reserve System. In this respect I invite attention to section 13b of the pending bill. It starts out by stating that a requirement for a loan is that it must be an exceptional circumstance. Well, what is an exceptional circumstance when you want to borrow money with which to carry on your business? You do not know and I do not know. So it becomes a matter of interpretation for the Federal Reserve Board or Federal Reserve bank.

Again:

It must appear to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank.

Well, precisely how are you going to satisfy them? What are you going to have to lay on the line by way of collateral, by way of conditions that are involved in your business that is going to satisfy the Federal Reserve Board?

Again:

It must be an established business.

What is an established business? Is it one that makes money now under depressed conditions, or is it a business that has been actually in operation for a number of years, irrespective of whether it is established in the sense that successful men so often use the word "established"?

It must be unable to get requisite financial assistance.

Well, how are you going to determine whether they can get requisite financial assistance "from the usual sources"? What are the usual sources? How many of them have been destroyed in the general bankruptcy that took place in all corners of the country?

In this section of the bill there may by interpretation be imposed a lot of conditions that give those who must approve these loans a beautiful opportunity to refuse such loans and point to the language of the bill to justify such refusal. When you apply for a loan he can say, "I am sorry but we cannot loan you this $60,000 with which to carry on your business, because it is not an exceptional circumstance; you can get the money from the usual sources; yours is not an established business; it does not appear to the satisfaction of the bank that you need this money."

Why not strip all this verbiage from the bill, confer some discretionary power, and let these loans be resolved clearly upon the basis of merit?

Another thing I wish to point out, if time is available, is the advisory committee set up in connection with the Federal Reserve bank to be composed of not less than three nor more than five members. Now, I should like to see a commission provided for in this section on which each State shall have at least one member. Some of the Federal Reserve districts embrace more than one State. Why should not each State have a member on this advisory board? Not only that, the set-up of such a committee should be even more specific. What is to prevent the Federal Reserve bank in Chicago, for instance, from selecting all three or all five of the members of the advisory committee from the city of Chicago and ignoring all the other cities in our State? It seems to me there should be a qualifying provision making it necessary to select the personnel of this advisory committee from the three or the five largest cities in the State of Illinois, or in the Federal Reserve district, so that every city or every section of the Federal Reserve district shall be represented. The practical application of it is this: I live 180 miles from Chicago, and also 180 miles from St. Louis. Must the people in my district, in order to consult some member of the committee, run constantly to St. Louis or Chicago when the Federal Reserve bank could probably find a competent man within 25 or 30 miles of where I live, or in my immediate district? As a matter of fact, I think it would subject little business to an undue amount of hardship and restriction unless this personnel was so diffused as to make it representative not only of the States but of the various sections of the States, so that all industry will be close to the fountainhead of this financial reservoir and get help if they need it and can qualify for it without undue difficulty.

The thing I point out more than anything else is the necessity for getting away from general terminology in bills of a relief nature, getting away from language that will keep these administrators in a quandary as to what Congress had in mind, and then ultimately turn down the relief with the statement that it was not an exceptional circumstance; that there was money available at prevailing rates, and so forth.

Mr. PRALL. The words "under exceptional circumstances" appeared in an earlier bill and do not appear in the present bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I compared this section with the same section in the original bill and I thought it had been drafted in toto.

Mr. PRALL. Those words were taken out.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Nearly everything else has been left in the provision. I still believe it is loosely constructed and is open to objection because, after all, these needs must be interpreted in the light of human experience. You have to deal with personalities. Why give them the instrumentalities whereby they may too often evade the obligation which Congress seeks to impose?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Will the gentleman discuss the proposition of a man borrowing $100,000 and having a time limitation of 5 years in which to pay that money back. This requires him to produce each year clear of all costs and expense 20 percent of the loan plus interest. The time limit should be extended.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not so sure that the time should be extended unless we are going to raise the ante from $100,000 to a million dollars.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in 1929, when nearly all the available cash had been withdrawn from legitimate businesses and enterprises and utilized for gambling purposes, bringing about the greatest crash in the history of our Nation, I endeavored, realizing the conditions which existed, to interest the Federal Reserve Board in rediscounting commercial paper, such as finance corporation paper, municipal and other good securities. Unfortunately, the Director of the Federal Reserve Board and the membership of the Federal Reserve Board refused to listen to my appeals and refused to consider any such loans. Had the Federal Reserve Board at that time accepted for rediscount finance corporation paper, municipal securities, and a few other securities I had in mind, we would have at least minimized the crash and this pending legislation would not have been necessary. It is for that reason that I regret, as does the gentleman from Maine, that such greater powers are given to the Federal Reserve Board. I had hoped that this power would be vested in the reliable and experienced Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I think the experience we had with the Federal Reserve Board, the members of which sat by in 1928 and up to July 1929, permitting, sanctioning, and encouraging the use of billions and billions of dollars for gambling purposes, should be taken into consideration. If the Board had taken a positive stand at that time, it could have safeguarded the legitimate business of the Nation. But it failed, and for this reason I would much rather have seen the power that has been granted to the Federal Reserve Board vested in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The Federal Reserve Board, having refused to relieve the situation and having refused to stop the tremendous and injurious flow of money to Wall Street in 1930, knowing the wonderful effect the Finance Corporation had upon the Nation as a whole and how it had saved legitimate business, I introduced a bill creating a Finance Corporation, which was later designated as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Had my bill been accepted and adopted at that time, we would not be here considering these amendments, because at that time the necessary provisions were embodied in my bill, providing that industries might obtain relief and aid the same as insurance companies, railroad corporations, and banking institutions; but, unfortunately, the committee thought that it should accept the so-called "administration bill." After this bill was reported to the House and certain amendments added—and I believe in the right direction—President Hoover, as the gentleman from New York stated, vetoed the bill and made impossible the lending of money to private industry, depriving the bill of that broader scope contemplated by the House. I am not a banker or an economist, but I greatly regret that my advice was not accepted. If it had been, I know that millions of American people would have been saved from desolation and despair. Hundreds of thousands of persons would have been saved from losing their homes and their farms through foreclosure and consequent untold and unwarranted misery.

But that day has passed. We have before us a bill which would try to remedy these evils. I think the bill is a move in the right direction, with the exception that I would have preferred, as I have stated, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be given the power.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I cannot yield to the gentleman from Connecticut at this time; but I want to say that I am fully cognizant and appreciate that he has worked on this bill, and, in fact, as early as in February, he submitted a draft of a bill which, I felt, was legislation in the right direction, and its principles and some of its provisions are now embodied in the bill before us.

What does this bill do? It provides for the lending of additional money to drainage and levee districts. It authorizes additional loans for approved projects. It allows the making of loans to insurance companies. It provides for making loans to certain export corporations, and also gives the Federal Reserve the power to rediscount. There are several other important provisions in the bill which I have not the time to explain, but I know that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEGALL], chairman of the committee, will understandingly do so at length, as will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] also, who is thoroughly familiar with the bill. The rule itself was intelligently explained by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], Chairman of the Rules Committee and, therefore, needs no further comment. It is an open rule. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has splendidly, in his usual able manner, pointed out the beneficial effects of some of the provisions of the bill, therefore I will devote myself to the provision to which not only I, but a majority of the Members are interested, namely, the amendment which I hope will be offered by the committee to bring about the much-delayed and deserved relief to the worthy school teachers.

Repeating, I have not the time to go into some of the provisions of the bill which I would like to, but may I say in justice to the Committee on Banking and Currency that it has had a great task before it and I am very much pleased to be here today supporting this bill that it has recommended, knowing the trials and tribulations of that splendid committee. I hope that we can pass this bill in a short time. I had hoped I would not be compelled to take even a few minutes of the time of the House to explain my position and the bill; but in view of my great interest in the matter since 1929, I could not resist the temptation once more to call attention to the fact that had the bill been enacted that I pleaded for in 1929 and 1930 we would not be here today in such an unfortunate situation enacting this absolutely necessary and mandatory legislation.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Since 1929 it has been argued on both sides of the House in connection with matters touching the banking situation that it was the activities of the Federal Reserve System and the private bankers in granting liberal loans to brokers and for the expansion of most everything that brought on the catastrophe of 1929.

Mr. SABATH. That is correct.

Mr. MAY. If we leave the authority with the Federal Reserve System instead of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, what assurances have we that they will loosen up now?

Mr. SABATH. I may say we have a different membership on the Federal Reserve Board and I have more confidence in the present members of the Federal Reserve Board than I had in it in 1928 and 1929.

Before concluding I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], as well as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], for calling attention to my proposed amendment.

All I desire and all I have been seeking since I first introduced my bill in 1930, is to make it possible for school boards that have good and sufficient collateral security may have the privilege, for educational purposes, of appearing before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and asking for consideration, with promise of favorable action, if they can show that the funds are needed for this purpose and that they are in a position to give sufficient collateral security. I have the utmost confidence in the Committee on Banking and Currency and I hope that the chairman of the committee or some member thereof to whom I have appealed so often will offer the amendment so that the appreciation of the thousands of school teachers and fathers and mothers of school children concerned will be theirs. I do not seek the honor or the special privilege which naturally would be mine. I am interested in our public schools; I am interested in our school children and I am interested in the thousands of penniless and needy school teachers of America, many of whom have not been paid for the last 8 or 9 months. They should be paid at least a portion of the amount due them, if not all of it.

Therefore I appeal to you who feel as kindly as you have signified to me when I have approached you from time to time to aid the committee and me in adopting this amendment, because, after all, it is limited to $75,000,000, and I am sure it will not require even $60,000,000, and every dollar of it will be repaid to the Government with interest. This will be the safest and the best loan that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has ever made or can possibly make. Therefore, desirous of effecting prompt consideration of the bill as well as my amendment, I shall yield in the fervent hope that you will cooperate with the splendid committee that reported this bill and pass it in as short a time as practicable. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3487) relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3487, with Mr. MCREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this bill is presented in answer to a Nation-wide demand for loans of a type that are not being made by the commercial banks of the country and which the commercial banks cannot adequately supply within the rules that bankers regard as prudent and wise.

The bill embodies two methods for affording relief.

The first provision enlarges the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by permitting loans to be made to industrial or commercial institutions where necessary credit cannot be obtained through usual channels; and the permission is extended until the 31st of January, 1935.

The amount which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to employ in loans of this type is $300,000,000. Loans are to be repaid within a period of 5 years.

The officials of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation testified before the Committee on Banking and Currency; they appeared also before a subcommittee, of which Mr. PRALL was chairman, that gave most painstaking and industrious consideration to this whole problem and conducted extended hearings. Mr. PRALL and his subcommittee did a most creditable piece of work in this connection. The testimony was that the sum provided here would more than amply cover the loans which it is contemplated the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will make within the period fixed by the law.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I am going to ask gentlemen not to request me to yield until I have concluded.

There are other provisions amendatory of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, most of them of a regulatory and minor character. The gentleman from New York, Mr. PRALL, will submit a complete analysis of these provisions.

The other provision of the bill which is intended to take care of loans of the type mentioned by me, authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to employ their surplus for such loans, and the provision as to the Federal Reserve banks is made permanent law. This provision authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to make direct loans to or purchase obligations of any established industrial or commercial business that is unable to obtain assistance through customary credit channels for the purpose of supplying such business with capital; such obligations shall not be acquired with maturity exceeding 5 years.

The Federal Reserve banks have on hand a surplus of between $140,000,000 and $150,000,000. The exact figures at this time cannot be had. The bill fixes the amount of the loan upon the basis of the surplus that will be disclosed on the 1st of July, which will undoubtedly show an amount of $140,000,000 or more.

This amount should not be taken as indicating the limit of the service that may be rendered by the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve banks may make commitments to financial institutions extending loans, and in this way render a large measure of service requiring no cash.

The bill contemplates that the Federal Reserve banks will cooperate with other lending institutions. It authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to share in loans with other loaning institutions to the amount of 80 percent—the loaning institution to take 20 percent and the Federal Reserve banks the balance, and to share in the losses in the same proportion.

It was pointed out by the officials of the Federal Reserve banks that the banks, by being enabled to make commitments of loans in cooperation with lending institutions, may render a service which, expressed in dollars and cents, would be much greater than would be indicated by the amount of the surplus of the Federal Reserve banks.

A survey was made by the Federal Reserve banks in order that proper information might be had to enable the framers of this act to understand the requirements of the situation. They received replies from 4,958 banks and 1,066 chambers of commerce.

These replies, of course, were estimates. It was estimated that the amount of working capital required was between $622,000,000 and $716,000,000. It was also estimated that the number of men to be continued in employment by furnishing additional working capital to small industries was about 350,000, and the number of men to be given employment by furnishing capital to small industries was about 389,000.

Now, there is no conflict or contradiction in the two methods that are undertaken to be established by this bill. Federal Reserve banks will be the primary institutions to which will be directed requests for loans. A board of five members, chosen from industrial pursuits will be established and will consider the applications for loans. Applications will be considered along with recommendations of the board.

The temporary plan embodying authority for loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would be in the nature of an appellate court during the present emergency to which applicants could take their cases in the event they were unable to obtain accommodations through banking channels or through the extraordinary facilities which the Federal Reserve banks employ in loans of this kind.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extent my remarks by publishing a letter from Mr. Jones, Chairman of the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, May 22, 1934.

DEAR CHAIRMAN: Replying to your inquiry as to the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation:

Since February 2, 1932, the date of its organization, the Corporation has authorized disbursements for loans, purchases of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures, aggregating over $5,500,000,000. In addition, the Corporation has disbursed practically $800,000,000 for relief.

The $5,500,000,000 includes $788,000,000 loans to or for the account of closed banks for distribution to depositors, and approximately $1,100,000,000 for the purchase of preferred stock and capital notes and debentures in 6,994 banks.

Probably our most important and far-reaching function has been the rehabilitation of the capital structure of the Nation's banks, both State and National, through authorizing the purchase of preferred stock and capital notes and debentures. The investment of these funds has the twofold purpose of preventing further bank failures, thereby insuring bank deposits and enabling the banks to function in a normal way in the extension of credit. By helping the banks in this manner we have helped the depositors and borrowers. In my view, a strong banking system, with every bank a sound bank, is essential to a sustained recovery.

Out of loans to 5,137 banks, authorized in the amount of $1,318,227,512.91, with actual disbursement of $1,113,478,667.93, all has been repaid except $310,606,571.36.

Our loans actually disbursed for all purposes aggregate $3,189,198,230.87, upon which we have had repayments of $1,427,807,838.10, or approximately 45 percent.

It may be of interest to note that 34.9 percent of our loans went to banks; 16 percent for disbursement to depositors in closed banks; 3.6 percent to building-and-loan associations; 2.7 percent to insurance companies; 6.1 percent to Federal land banks; 0.3 percent to Federal intermediate-credit banks; 0.5 percent to joint-stock land banks; 0.4 percent to livestock credit corporations; 6.4 percent to mortgage loan companies, other than those made in the reorganization of banks; 5.3 percent to regional agricultural credit corporations; 12.5 percent to railroads; 2.5 percent to self-liquidating projects; 0.4 percent for the sale of agricultural surpluses in foreign markets; 6.2 percent for loans on agricultural commodities, including corn, cotton, wheat, etc.; and 2.2 percent for other loans.

You will be interested to know that of loans aggregating $434,000,000 to 1,362 banks that closed after receiving loans, $250,000,000 has been repaid.

The Corporation is required to furnish the Secretary of the Treasury with funds aggregating $325,000,000 to enable him to purchase the capital stock of home loan banks and the capital stock of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Of this amount, practically $200,000,000 has been paid to him.

The Corporation is required to furnish $200,000,000 to the Land Bank Commissioner to enable him to make direct loans to farmers and $100,000,000 to make loans to joint-stock land banks. All of the $200,000,000 has been disbursed and $2,600,000 of the $100,000,000.

The Corporation was also required to allocate $200,000,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture to enable him to make crop loans. Of this amount, $115,000,000 net was paid to him. The sum of $44,500,000 was used to provide capital for Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations and $40,500,000 was reallocated to the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration. All of these amounts have been disbursed.

Our loans of 10 cents a pound on cotton and 45 cents a bushel on corn, insured the people in the cotton States and in the great Corn Belt, a living price for these products. These and other loans for marketing agricultural products, have aggregated $210,000,000 to date. Our loans to regional and other Agricultural Credit Corporations, aggregating $189,000,000, were also in the interest of agriculture and the livestock industry.

Of $220,000,000 authorized for self-liquidating projects, $80,000,000 has been expended to date. The work is well under way, and disbursement should be practically completed within the next 18 months.

With few exceptions, our loans to railroads are well secured and our loss from these loans will be very small. Our gold operations were without profit or loss, the Treasury taking over the gold we had accumulated at cost and interest.

We have authorized about $18,500,000 in loans to industry through community mortgage companies, but the procedure is cumbersome and unsatisfactory, for which reason we have asked the power to lend direct to industry, but the amount that we be permitted to lend to a single industry should not, in our opinion, be limited to less than $1,000,000.

Very truly yours,

JESSE H. JONES, Chairman.

Hon. HENRY B. STEAGALL,
Chairman House Committee on Banking and Currency,
Washington, D.C.

Mr. STEAGALL. Now, in view of the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] has devoted so much time and study to this legislation, and in order that he may have sufficient opportunity to discuss the measure, I yield the remainder of my time to Mr. PRALL. [Applause.]

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, while this bill provides for direct loans to industry, and while that is the most important thing, I believe, confronting us today in order to bring back recovery, yet there are other amendments to this bill that I should like to explain briefly and, owing to the fact that the time is so short and that so many members wish to be heard upon the subject, I shall make it as brief as possible.

SECTION 1

This section of the bill proposes amendments to Revised Statutes, section 882, which now reads as follows:

> Copies of any books, records, papers, or documents in any of the executive departments authenticated under the seals of such departments, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof.

The Corporation, with hundreds of millions of dollars of its funds tied up in loans to banks and other borrowers in every part of the country, has a tremendous investment to protect. The Corporation necessarily is now, and will be, involved in a multitude of suits in connection with the liquidation of the collateral that it holds and hence should not be hampered in its efforts to protect its investment by not having the same procedural rights and remedies as now given by statute to the United States itself. The first four sections of the drafted bill propose to a limited extent to put the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other corporations wholly owned by the United States on a procedural parity with the United States itself.

Litigation involving the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and similar corporations wholly owned by the United States often requires the introduction in evidence of the books, records, papers, or other documents of such corporations. Paragraph (a) of section 882, as amended, would modify to a limited extent the so-called "best evidence" rule of law, which is to the effect that copies of papers or documents may be introduced in evidence only upon a showing to the court that the originals thereof are destroyed or unobtainable. The making of such a showing necessarily entails delay and expense. The proposed amendment is designed, therefore, to give corporations wholly owned by the United States the right already given to the executive departments of the United States by Revised Statutes, section 882, to introduce in evidence authenticated copies of their official documents in lieu of the originals thereof.

Paragraph (b) of the Revised Statutes, section 882, as amended, is an entirely new paragraph for this section and will affect all executive departments and corporations wholly owned by the United States. The amendment will eliminate much of the expense and inconvenience now imposed by the hearsay rule of evidence in connection with proving certain facts set forth in and transactions taking place in connection with official books and records. Under the so-called "business entry" exceptions to the hearsay rule, books, records, minutes, and other papers kept in the regular course of business are admissible in evidence to prove the truth of certain statements contained therein upon a preliminary showing to the satisfaction of the court that the entries or notations in question were made in the regular course of business by the proper person or persons. Most of the books and records of the Government departments and corporations are thus at present admissible in evidence under the aforesaid exception to the hearsay rule to prove the truth of statements contained therein; but not, however, without a preliminary showing as to the manner in which such books or records are kept and as to how the particular entries or notations were made. In most instances this requires sending a representative of the Government department or corporation to the scene of trial to testify as to such facts. The proposed amendment would eliminate this expense and inconvenience by making the seal of the department or corporation a substitute for such preliminary showing.

It is to be noted that the books, records, or minutes in question are not to be admissible as evidence of the truth of any statement contained therein but only of any "act, transaction, occurrence, or event as a memorandum of which such books, records, minutes, or entries therein were kept or made."

Paragraph (c), also an entirely new paragraph for Revised Statutes, section 882, provides for judicial notice of the seal of any executive department or corporation wholly owned by the United States. It is designed to make the papers or documents referred to in the preceding paragraphs admissible in evidence without the unreasonable burden of proving the seal of such department or corporation.

Paragraph (b) of section 1 of the bill provides for judicial notice of the seal of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and would serve the same purpose, within its limited field, as paragraph (c) of the Revised Statutes, section 882, as amended above.

This section of the bill would amend Revised Statutes, section 1001, as amended, which, as it stands at present, exempts the United States from the requirement of filing appeal bonds. The proposed amendment would give corporations wholly owned by the United States the same exemption now given the United States.

The purpose of requiring the filing of an appeal bond as a condition of entering an appeal by a party to a suit defeated in a lower court is the indemnification of the party who has been successful in the lower court from the possibility that the appealing party may become judgment proof during the appeal interval. This requirement has no reasonable application, however, to the Federal or State Governments or departments.

This section of the bill proposes the addition of a new section to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to be known as "section 5 (b)." This section would permit the Corporation to make loans for sufficiently long periods to enable borrowers to repay the Corporation without the depression in business activity which might result from too rapid utilization of capital for such repayments.

Paragraph (1) authorizes the Corporation to make loans for periods up to 5 years from February 1, 1935, in lieu of the 3 years now permitted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended. Paragraph (2) permits the Corporation to extend the time of payment of any loan already made by it up to 5 years from February 1, 1935, in lieu of the present limitation on such extension of 5 years from the date of initial disbursement.

Paragraph (1) contains a provisio that as a condition of making loans to railroads for a period longer than 3 years, the Corporation may require:

> That such arrangements be made for the reduction of amortization of the indebtedness of the railroad or railway, either in whole or in part, as may be approved by the Corporation after the prior approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This provision is considered necessary to adequately protect the Corporation's interests in connection with these longer-term loans, and is in accordance with the plan for scaling down of debt structures, suggested by the President in a recent public statement.

The proviso of paragraph (2) requires, as a condition of the extension of the time of payment of any loan made by the Corporation to a railroad, (a) the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and (b) the certification of the Interstate Commerce Commission "that the railroad or railway is not in need of financial reorganization in the public interest." This condition is in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation dated January 20, 1934. Such approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission is now required in the case of new loans by section 15 of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 1933, and, as pointed out in detail in the Coordinator's report, the fact that similar approval is not required in connection with the extension of existing loans is merely a defect in the present law. The proviso of paragraph (2) is an attempt to remedy this defect.

Paragraph (3) of section 3 of the bill authorizes the Corporation to accept new securities in adjustment or compromise of existing claims in connection with railroads in bankruptcy receivership proceedings. This amendment is necessary if the railroads of the country are to be reorganized on an economically and financially sound basis. Without such power, the ability of the Corporation to agree to any plan of reorganization which may involve reduction of the topheavy capital structure of some of the railroads of the country is so restricted that the reorganizations which can be effected during the present depression must be extremely limited. The most successful railroad reorganizations of the past, such as that of the Union Pacific and of the Atchison during the 1890's were effected during a depression period. The proposed amendment adequately safeguards the exercise of the power by requiring the prior approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by providing that any such adjustment or compromise shall not be made on less favorable terms than those provided in the reorganization for holders of claims of the same class and rank as the claims of the Corporation.

This section would authorize the Corporation to make loans to complete any self-liquidating project for the construction of which it has already advanced funds, and also for such improvements, additions, extensions, or equipment as are necessary or desirable for the proper functioning of any such project or as will materially improve the Corporation's investment position.

It has been the experience of the Corporation in connection with certain loans it has made for part of the construction cost of self-liquidating projects that the borrowers have been unable to obtain from other sources the funds necessary for the completion of the projects. The result is that the Corporation's original investment—often represented by revenue bonds—is jeopardized, because a partially completed project cannot earn the revenues necessary to meet interest and principal charges on the Corporation's bonds. The proposed amendment would empower the Corporation to make loans for such completion.

It has also been the experience of the Corporation that due to conditions arising after the making of loans for self-liquidating construction projects, improvements, additions, or extensions to such projects or the purchase of equipment are necessary or desirable for the proper functioning of such projects or for the protection or improvement of the Corporation's original investment position. In such cases the lien on the project and its revenues which the Corporation usually has makes it very difficult for the borrowers from the Corporation to obtain outside funds for such improvements, additions, extensions, or equipment. The proposed amendment is designed, therefore, to authorize the Corporation to make loans for such purposes.

SECTION 5

This section of the bill authorizes the Corporation, upon request, to adjust the maturities of the obligations of borrowers who have obtained loans from the Corporation for self-liquidating construction projects. This section was not contained in the original draft bill submitted by this Corporation but has been inserted by the committee. A similar provision is contained in the Senate bill, S. 3085.

SECTION 6

Paragraph (1) proposes the increase from $50,000,000 to $125,000,000 of the amount which the Corporation is authorized to lend to drainage, levee, and irrigation districts, and so forth, pursuant to section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended. In the draft bill submitted by the Corporation to the House Banking and Currency Committee, provision was made for an increase in this amount only to $100,000,000. The committee, however, has seen fit to increase this amount to $125,000,000.

As of February 17, 1934, the Corporation had received applications under section 36 aggregating $116,737,754, which represented total indebtedness of $224,794,014. Additional applications are being received by the Corporation daily. Unless the $50,000,000 limit now imposed on the Corporation by said section 36 is raised, therefore, as contemplated in the bill, many eligible applicants will not be able to receive the benefits of the section.

This paragraph also proposes the inclusion of two new classes of borrowers, mutual nonprofit companies and incorporated water users' associations, within the categories of borrowers eligible to receive the benefits of section 36. This change was not contemplated by the draft bill submitted by the Corporation, but was inserted by the House committee. The same change has been incorporated in the bill passed by the Senate—S. 3085.

Paragraph (3). Clause (4) of section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as it now reads, requires every borrower, as a condition of its loan, to agree to pay to the Corporation, so long as any part of the loan is outstanding, an "amount equal to the amount by which the assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by the borrower exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project and maturities of interest and principal on its outstanding obligations."

The framers of the act must have intended that the Corporation would apply any moneys so received toward repayment of the respective loans. The act, as it now stands, however, fails to impose such a requirement, and the proposed amendment is designed to correct this defect.

The language of the present act would seem, moreover, to prohibit borrowers from setting up reserves. The setting up of such reserves is generally good business practice, hence the proposed amendment expressly permits borrowers to make allowance for such reserves before applying surplus funds to the retirement of this Corporation's indebtedness.

Paragraph (4). The first sentence would authorize the Corporation to make loans to any borrower to which the Corporation had already made a refinancing loan pursuant to section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended, for repairs or improvements which are necessary or desirable for the proper functioning of the project, or which will serve to protect the Corporation's entire investment in the project. In the draft bill submitted by this Corporation the scope of this provision was limited to districts and political subdivisions, but the committee has seen fit to extend its scope to include mutual nonprofit companies and incorporated water users' associations. As will be seen from the explanation below, there is much less reason for applying the benefits of this provision to companies and associations than there is to districts and political subdivisions.

The Corporation has found that the irrigation or drainage works of some of the districts to which it has made refinancing loans have been damaged and that the districts, because of their strained financial conditions, have been unable to make necessary repairs. Such damages have cut off or tended to reduce the ability of many of the landowners of the district to pay their taxes or assessments.

The Public Works Administration now has authority to make loans for the physical rehabilitation of such districts. Both that Administration and this Corporation, however, are empowered to make loans only upon adequate security, and in most cases of this kind neither the refinancing loan nor the loan for repairs can be considered properly secured unless the other loan is made. At present a district is compelled to file an application for the refunding loan with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and a separate application for the rehabilitation loan with the Public Works Administration. Such procedure is unnecessarily cumbersome and expensive.

The proposed amendment, as worded in the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation draft, is designed to remedy this situation by affording a simple and direct method of rehabilitating the entire physical and financial structure of these districts through application to a single Federal agency.

The second sentence of paragraph (4) is designed to permit the Corporation to make the loans authorized under section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act, either directly to the borrower or to the holders of its outstanding indebtedness, and either upon promissory notes or through the purchase of the securities of the borrower.

In all cases where the Corporation has made loans under said section 36 it has required that at least 90 percent of the outstanding indebtedness of the borrower be refunded, but almost always some of the bondholders do not turn in their outstanding securities.

In order to benefit the nondeposited bonds as little as possible and to permit the Corporation to keep control of the nonassenters, it would in many cases be advantageous for the Corporation to actually purchase the bonds of the holders approving the refunding plan.

In some cases the borrowers have no authority to issue new bonds to refund outstanding obligations. In such situations the proposed amendment would authorize the Corporation to purchase part of the bonds deposited pursuant to the refunding plan and to cancel the remainder.

SECTION 7

Paragraph (a) proposes amendments to sections 2 and 3 of Public, No. 35, Seventy-third Congress. The amendments to section 2 are designed to improve and clarify the position, under the act, of mutual insurance companies.

Such companies cannot, of course, issue preferred stock, and there is grave doubt as to their power to issue capital notes. In practically every instance, however, the State statutes dealing with mutual insurance companies authorize such companies to sell guaranty-fund certificates, the proceeds of the sale of which may be used in the same manner as capital, but no statute has been found containing any reference to capital notes. The proposed amendments are designed, therefore, to clarify the situation and permit mutual companies to offer such forms of indebtedness to the corporation as may be permitted by the laws of the State in which the applicant company is incorporated, and thus remove the uncertainty as to what constitutes capital notes.

The principal amendment to section 3 of Public, No. 35, Seventy-third Congress, involves a complete rewriting of clause (3). This clause, as written at present, prevents companies in which the Corporation has purchased preferred stock or capital notes, or on the preferred stock or capital notes of which it has made loans, from increasing the compensation of any of its employees, so long as any of such stock or notes are held by the Corporation. It has been found that this requirement which prevents a company from raising the pay of any clerk or stenographer makes operation unreasonably burdensome. The proposed amendment would therefore permit salary raises, but only with the consent of the Corporation, and never to a level in excess of $17,500.

The amendment also proposes certain changes in the existing language, which are designed to clear up present ambiguity.

Paragraph (b) proposes an amendment to section 11 of Public, No. 35, Seventy-third Congress, which section, as it reads at present, limits the application of the act to companies operating under the supervision of a State superintendent or department of insurance in any of the States of the United States. It could not have been intended that insurance companies operating under the laws of the District of Columbia or of a possession or Territory of the United States should not receive the benefits of the act, and the proposed amendment is designed to remedy this defect.

SECTION 8

This section of the bill was not in the original draft bill submitted by the Corporation but has been inserted by the Committee. The same provision was inserted in the Senate bill (S. 3085) by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, at the suggestion of Senator GORE.

SECTION 9

This is also a new section inserted in the bill by the committee. No similar provision is contained in the Senate bill—S. 3085.

SECTION 10

Section 5 (c) is designed to permit the Corporation to aid in financing and to facilitate exports and imports between this and other nations by the establishment and financing of necessary trading agencies or banking corporations wholly owned by the United States. The section would, in substance, simplify the present method of creating export-import banks by giving the Corporation, with the approval of the President, the right to purchase and hold the common as well as the preferred stock in such institutions. Funds for common stock are at present obtained from the Public Works appropriation under the authority of the National Industrial Recovery Act. The enactment of this section will eliminate this drain upon Public Works funds and will greatly simplify disbursement procedure.

SECTION 11

The purpose of this section is not to provide an alternative to the plan for Federal Reserve loans to industry contained in section 12 of this bill nor to place the Corporation in direct competition with the private banks of the country in which the Corporation now owns a large financial interest. The section is intended rather as a supplement to both or either of these agencies. There are many crippled industries of the smaller and medium-sized type that will need aid for some time to come, and while some of these involve risks which, though ultimately good, commercial banks should not take and the Federal Reserve banks might decline, many of them deserve a chance to reestablish themselves.

The additional authority to make direct loans to industry contemplated by this section will be administered by the Corporation in cooperation with the other Government credit agencies, including the Federal Reserve banks, as well as with the banks of the country. So used, the power granted by the proposed amendment should effectively complete and round out the efforts of private and governmental agencies to meet all of the credit demands of small and medium-sized businesses in every field.

The proposed section authorizes the Corporation to make direct loans or to advance credit to industrial and commercial concerns only when adequate credit on reasonable terms is not otherwise available. Such loans and advances are to mature in not to exceed 5 years and are limited, inasmuch as the program is a recovery measure, by the requirement of a showing of continued or increased resulting employment of labor.

It should be noted that the aggregate of loans to any one borrower under this bill is limited to $100,000, whereas such limit under the Senate bill (S. 3085) is $1,000,000.

SECTIONS 12, 13, AND 14

These sections embody in substance the so-called "Glass bill" providing for loans by the Federal Reserve banks for industrial and commercial purposes. Inasmuch as these sections do not directly concern this Corporation it seems inappropriate to discuss or attempt to explain them in this explanation.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The estimate of $300,000,000 that would be extended in the form of loans until January 1 was based on the assumption that the maximum loan would be $1,000,000.

Mr. PRALL. No; I will not say that. I do not know what the assumption was with respect to the million dollars. The original Senate bill carried, I think, $250,000,000, as the aggregate amount of loans. It provided for the aggregate amount to any one borrower of $1,000,000. Our committee increased from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 the total amount the R.F.C. would be authorized to loan, but we felt at the time that inasmuch as this money had to be loaned on or before January 31, 1935, just a matter of some months, it would not be physically possible for any agency under the circumstances to loan more than that amount.

Mr. PATMAN. I agree with what the gentleman has said, but does he not think that is a good reason why we should consider putting the amount back at $1,000,000 so as to get as much money out as possible? If necessary we can increase the total amount, $300,000,000, allowed in this bill.

Mr. PRALL. I believe that $100,000 is too low. I think $500,000 would be a better figure.

Mr. PATMAN. In other words, we have plenty of money in this bill. Three hundred million dollars will be sufficient, even if the amount is $1,000,000 maximum, instead of $100,000?

Mr. PRALL. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. And there is no reason why we should not permit the maximum to be greater than $100,000, and provide that preference shall be given to small loans?

Mr. PRALL. The question was raised at one of the committee meetings as to the number of loans that had already been made at $1,000,000 by the R.F.C. One member made the point that it would be possible for the R.F.C. to make only 250 loans of $1,000,000 each. Mr. Jones advised the committee that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had made but a few loans of a million dollars each. In each case it assured continued employment of more than 3,500 people. He was of the opinion that all small loans could be taken care of and that there would be no danger, in placing a limit of $1,000,000, of running short of funds.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Did he not limit the number to possibly 20 of those million-dollar loans?

Mr. PRALL. He said it might be possible to make not more than 20.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. The gentleman spoke of the necessity of an applicant for a loan first going to the Federal Reserve bank. Many firms have gone through that step and, for a mere technicality, have had their loans turned down. Will those applicants now be in good standing?

Mr. PRALL. Well, that is hard to tell. The Federal Reserve Board has not had the authority heretofore which we have given them in this bill, nor has the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but under this bill we are using the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a haven to which borrowers may go when all banking facilities fail them.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. That is just what I mean. The fact that a firm has been turned down on the judgment of a court, with a perfectly good balance sheet, and then gone through probably 6 months getting themselves up to that point, now, if they have to go back over that 6 months, will they survive until they can get this new loan?

Mr. PRALL. I should say this new law would enable the two agencies to accept those statements.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. That answers my question.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that they will not be required to make any showing, other than to state, "We have gone to the Federal Reserve bank, we have gone to the local banks, and we cannot get accommodations there. We want you to assist us." Will that not be sufficient under this law?

Mr. PRALL. I think so.

Mr. ARENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. ARENS. There is no provision in this bill to regulate the interest rate. Is there any way to find what the rate will be?

Mr. PRALL. The interest rate now, as I understand it, in all matters connected with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is 4 percent. It has been reduced twice during the past 12 months, and I think it is now uniform at 4 percent.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. In section 11 I notice loans are authorized to industrial or commercial business. Would the gentleman construe that to include apartment-house buildings, in which there are several apartments; buildings that are too large and which house more families than is permitted under the Home Owners' Corporation law?

Mr. PRALL. That might, by some stretch of the imagination, be considered commercial. I do not know.

Mr. BOILEAU. I have had some inquiries with reference to that matter. It occurs to me that unless we include apartment buildings as commercial enterprises, that is about the only class of business we have not provided for in some bill or other. I am wondering, if this bill does not cover commercial apartment buildings, if we could not amend it so as to include them.

Mr. PRALL. I think the gentleman will find that under the new housing bill, provision will be made for matters of that kind. I think it will cover everything not now covered by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman means not only as far as new construction is concerned, but also the financing of buildings already built?

Mr. PRALL. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. BOILEAU. With the gentleman's assurance in that regard, I shall not ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. PRALL. I cannot assure the gentleman, because the matter is in its infancy now. The bill has just been introduced, but that is my view of it.

Mr. BOILEAU. It occurs to me that apartment buildings are about the only kind of business or property that has not been provided for in one bill or another, and if there is any question about it being included in the bill to which the gentleman refers, it should be taken care of in this bill.

Mr. PRALL. I think the gentleman will find that the housing bill will take care of that situation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is that before the gentleman's committee also?

Mr. PRALL. Yes.

Mr. COLMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Is provision made in this bill for refinancing outstanding obligations of industry?

Mr. PRALL. There is a part of this bill that takes care of that. There is provision for that. The present provision for loans to industry is not contemplated to continue or to renew these loans. The Federal Reserve portion of the act is permanent and they can do that, but the primary object of the Reconstruction Finance loans, limited to 5 years, is to take care of unemployment, and to revive industry and permit them to get new machinery and modern appliances and equipment, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. COLMER. Quite so, but if provision is not made for an industry that is struggling under enormous outstanding obligations, then it will be of no benefit to them.

Mr. PRALL. I believe there is provision for that. It seems on page 13, section 5 (b), paragraph 2——

Mr. COLMER. There is no question in the gentleman's mind about that?

Mr. PRALL. The paragraph I have referred to reads:

> The Corporation may at any time or from time to time extend or consent to the extension of the time of beginning of any loan.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Who will determine whether or not an application received comes within the purview of this act to be an industry?

Mr. PRALL. Either the Federal Reserve Board or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. DONDERO. One of the two.

Mr. PRALL. Either or both of them.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. I am greatly interested in paragraph 1, section 6, on page 16 of the bill, with reference to the loan of $125,000,000 to drainage districts. Was this provision in the Senate bill?

Mr. PRALL. Yes. The Senate bill provided for loans to drainage districts to the extent of $100,000,000, but the R.F.C. explained to our committee that it already had applications for more than $100,000,000 of such loans and recommended that the amount be increased to $125,000,000.

Mr. CULKIN. Do I understand that this is for initial reclamation, for the initiation of new projects?

Mr. PRALL. I think it is for renovation, refinancing, rebuilding, and preservation, really.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say to the gentleman it seems to me that is foreign to this bill; it is exotic; and it is grafted onto the bill improperly. It simply adds to the existing overproduction in America. I do not believe it has anything to do with this type of loan.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman from New York will yield, this money to be advanced to drainage districts will not make available any new area at all.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. PRALL. I yield.

Mr. DEROUEN. I am interested in section 23-b, which states that when it appears to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank that an "established industrial or commercial business", and so forth—what is meant by a commercial business? Is the Government going to provide personal loans to merchants and tailors?

Mr. PRALL. No; I would not say that. The whole idea of the bill, if the gentleman will permit, is to aid in the recovery of our country, is to bring back into employment those now idle. We do not expect the R.F.C. or Federal Reserve bank to grant a loan of any of these funds unless the applicant can show that it means either the continued employment of those who otherwise would become unemployed, or that it means the hiring of additional employees by the use of this money.

Mr. DEROUEN. I understand that, but I do not think the gentleman quite understood my question. I wish to know how far we are going?

Mr. PRALL. We must and shall depend upon the judgment of the Federal Reserve banks and the R.F.C.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, as I read the House bill, and as I read the Senate bill, it seems to me the difference between the two is the difference between traditional American private banking on the one hand and outright socialized nationalized banking on the other hand. This day should be a great day, and accepted as such by those who believe in socialized nationalized banking. A few days ago the gentleman from Washington stood upon this floor and said that he believed in nationalized banking. I commend him for his frankness. To so believe is most assuredly his right and his privilege. Time may prove him correct. For my part I do not believe in nationalized banking or in socialized banking, but the gentleman from Washington was infinitely more frank than is the House substitute for the Senate bill.

In the first place, this bill is very much like a great deal of our emergency legislation; it is a fraud and a deception practiced upon the people. The title states one purpose for the bill and then adds, "and for other purposes." The title of this act states that it is for direct loans for industrial purposes by the Federal Reserve bank, and for other purposes. Obviously the "other purposes" should be the minor part of a bill; but as in much of this emergency legislation it is just the other way about, the "other purposes" are the tail wagging the dog. This bill has been heralded to the country as being legislation providing for loans to industries. If loans to industries were the sole purpose of this bill, we would accept the Senate bill with such minor amendments as we might choose to make.

As I read this bill, that portion from page 11 to page 23 comprises the "other purposes." Let us see what some of these "other purposes" are. I am frank to say that it is exceedingly difficult for me to understand the meaning of sections 1, 2, and 3. So we come to section 4. It seems to me that section 4 destroys the protecting provisions of the Emergency Relief and Reconstruction Act of 1932.

Let us go to section 6. This section provides for increasing the amount of loans for irrigation projects from $50,000,000 to $125,000,000—an increase of $75,000,000. Do you suppose that many of the people of the country know this is in the bill? They have been led to believe that this is a bill providing for loans to small industries. None the less, this is added to the bill. If this provision has any place in this particular bill, then anyone who wants public credit for any given class should be here today with his amendment to include his class.

Now, I want to go on further to section 7. Again we are not talking about industries; we are authorizing the R.F.C. to buy preferred stock in insurance companies, and in the case of the mutual insurance companies which under the laws of their States cannot issue stock, the R.F.C. is authorized, in its discretion, to take as its collateral whatever the mutual companies have to offer which will be accepted by the R.F.C.

Going a little bit further, let us see what section 8 provides. Section 8 authorizes the making of loans by the R.F.C. to established, incorporated managing agencies of farmers' cooperative mineral-rights pools. Remember, the phrase "farmers' cooperative" does not have anything to do with agriculture or the making of any agriculture loans to farmers; it provides for the making of a loan to any kind of a farmers' cooperative interested in some kind of mineral business.

Then section 9 authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans based on mineral acreage to recognized and established incorporated agencies engaged in the business of mining, milling, or smelting of ores. Most assuredly, socialized banking! Authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to begin lending money to mining projects! Discrimination, though, of the worst type, because the loans are limited to two classes—farmer-organized cooperatives which are engaged in the mining business and to corporations engaged in the mining business—denying to an ordinary citizen of this country, or to a partnership, the same opportunities to avail themselves of Government credit.

Let us go a little further.

Section 10 authorizes without limit the R.F.C. to set up a corporation for the purpose of exporting and importing goods. When this bill is enacted into law, we shall set up our Government corporation to engage in the business of exporting and importing goods. We shall not name that corporation the Amtorg, but nevertheless it will be the same kind of corporation. It will mean that the Government of the United States has again looked across the Atlantic to Soviet Russia and borrowed from her the idea that our Government should be in the export and import business. Again socialized and nationalized banking and socialized and nationalized exporting and importing. When this bill is fully complied with, the R.F.C. stands as the great nationalized and socialized bank of this country. How far it will go, no one man knows. What will be the end of the obligation, no one knows.

Why is all this coming about? Some say we cannot get bank credit. Yes. But who is responsible? No one is quite so much responsible for the denial of banking credit in this country as is the Government of the United States. Through its national banking department it has sent petty bureaucrats into the banks of this country telling the bankers to mark off Bill Jones' note and Bill Smith's note. They have sent out petty bureaucrats to pass upon the value of the paper of the citizens of this country rather than to allow the man who runs the bank and who lives in the community to pass upon the matter. Of course, private credit is destroyed, but the reason is socialism on the part of the Government of the United States in undertaking to set up an inspection agency ruled over by petty bureaucrats, entitled "bank examiners", who go about the country passing upon the value of paper, instead of leaving this responsibility with the bankers of the respective communities.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I cannot quite understand why the gentleman from Kansas is so unduly excited. He seems to be under the impression that the unanimous report of the Committee on Banking and Currency is pure, unadulterated socialism. He ought to know from his experience in this House since the beginning of this Congress that compared to some legislation which has gone through the House that this is conservatism. This is one of the most conservative measures that we have had so far to deal with. It might have been called socialism 5 years ago, but today it ought to be considered safe and sound, as adequate collateral is required on all loans instead of shoveling the money out of the Treasury by way of doles.

Before I go further, may I call the attention of my good friends on the Democratic side, who have always claimed that the last Republican administration did nothing to solve the big problems that arose out of the depression, and who are continually challenging us and asking what we have done, to the fact that in this bill you are using the Republican machinery as recommended by Herbert Hoover, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to help get us out of the depression. Perhaps all the Democrats will not agree with me, but at least I believe in free speech and I am entitled to my own opinion. I believe that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, recommended by Herbert Hoover and adopted by a Democratic Congress, has done more to get us out of the depression than all the socialistic experiments and panaceas of the Democrats and "brain trust" combined.

Furthermore, I believe that if we had not put into effect the Reconstruction Finance Corporation during the Hoover administration, just before the Democratic administration came into power, credit in this country would have been completely paralyzed, and not only the banks but the railroads and the insurance companies and business generally would have been crippled and paralyzed, and there would have been a total collapse of credit. Through the machinery of the R.F.C. and the lending of $5,000,000,000 in the way of capital to industry to keep the wheels of industry turning and to provide employment, and I say again, using the Republican machinery, you have done more than the "brain trust" experiments have been able to do in the last year and a half. I predict that you, using good common sense, will continue to utilize this Republican vehicle, the R.F.C., to solve the great difficulties facing this country at the present time and which will face this country for some time to come. And may I say that we have not come to the end of our rope in appropriating money to lend through the R.F.C. on adequate collateral, not doles nor gifts out of the Treasury, such as most of the "brain trusters" have urged upon Congress, and which are loading us with debts and taxes and leading to huge deficits. I am not speaking for my party, although I believe the Republicans on the committee were unanimous; I am in favor of this legislation because what is needed more now than at any other time is to provide some means for the flow of capital into the smaller industries.

This should have been done a year ago. The thing that hampers it more than anything else is the Securities Act that we passed hoping to remedy abuses and evils that existed, but going too far, at the request of the visionary "brain trusters", defeated the very purpose of the bill, so that there is now no flow of capital into small or large industries. As Al Smith said, all we have been doing is giving business a shot in the arm. We have been giving them shots in the arm every once in a while, but these were only temporary measures. Now the Congress proposes to use this Republican vehicle, the R.F.C., to provide capital for smaller industries in order to keep the factories open and keep men employed.

The only objection I have heard to this bill, outside of the objection of the gentleman from Kansas, is the statement by someone that we had reduced the limit on the loans to too low an amount, $100,000. There is a good deal of reason and sound common sense why this amount should be reduced from a million dollars as contained in the Senate bill to $100,000 as appears in this bill. The original R.F.C. took care of the big fellows, such as the railroads and the banks, in amounts of a million dollars and upward.

It is time that the small business man, who probably makes up the larger part of our business in America should receive some attention. Where is he going to get his money? With your Securities Act and the depression, he cannot borrow it from the banks because of a lack of confidence and because at the present time the country is filled with uncertainties. We do not know what the dollar is going to be worth. It is 59 cents now, and it may be 50 cents next month.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield just for a simple question?

Mr. FISH. I cannot debate with the gentleman in 15 minutes.

Mr. SIROVICH. I just want to correct a statement of my friend.

Mr. FISH. No; I refuse to yield.

Industry cannot get any money because of the uncertainties. We do not know whether the silver bill is going through and whether that is going to mean a certain amount of inflation. We do not know whether these other bills that are pending will create further inflation, and for this, and many other reasons, the bankers will not lend money and you cannot blame them, because you would not lend it either if you had the responsibility.

So American business men have got to come to the Federal Government for loans to help turn the wheels of industry and provide employment. In its essence, of course, it is socialism—the Government lending money, but it is lending on collateral, which is different from giving money away as doles or outright contributions. In these days of radicalism and socialism it is really a conservative measure.

In the remaining time I have I wish to refer to the fact that there seems to be some misunderstanding between General Johnson and Clarence Darrow and Charles Edward Russell and Mr. Richberg, which raises a very interesting point, as you read these redhot charges and countercharges hurled by one socialistic member of the administration at another, each denouncing the other as being more socialistic than himself. The newspapers are filled today with vitriolic attacks by Mr. Richberg on Clarence Darrow. I know you Democrats have no more love for these Socialists and socialistic Democrats than I have; but I realize that you cannot get up here and say so, while I am at perfect liberty to do so. I really think I have as much sympathy on your side as I have, perhaps, on my own. The facts are—and this bitter contest ought to bring it before the country—there are scores of Socialists, not Democrats, but members of the Socialist Party and near-Socialists who have been appointed to high positions in the Roosevelt administration. And now for the first time we have a couple of Socialists, Mr. Richberg on one side and Mr. Clarence Darrow on the other, denouncing each other as Socialists and claiming that the other is a little more radical, and I hope the people back home will begin to understand that there are in this administration numerous Socialists appointed to important positions and drawing money out of the Treasury, who are actually not in sympathy with our economic and political systems.

As I have repeatedly said, socialism was not elected to power. Norman Thomas got less than 1,000,000 votes, but both Mr. Darrow and Mr. Richberg, to whom I have referred, belong to the League for Industrial Democracy. What does the League for Industrial Democracy stand for? It is the old Socialist Intercollegiate League, but having the word "Socialist" in it, it did not go so well, so they changed it to "League for Industrial Democracy." It has one slogan and one alone, and that is to do away with the profit system.

As I understand our economic system, call it what you will, capitalism or our own industrial system, it is based upon profit; and if you take the profit out of it, you either have communism or socialism, and, as a matter of fact, communism and socialism are identical so far as the economic aspect is concerned. They both stand for complete Government ownership and operation. These gentlemen both belong to this League for Industrial Democracy, a socialistic league, with every official in it a member of the Socialist Party, advocating the destruction of the profit system, and yet they hold these important positions in the Government service under a Democratic administration.

I believe in freedom of speech. They have a right to be Socialists; they have a right to oppose the profit system; they have a right to say anything they want. But is it quite fair to hold important positions and receive pay from the present administration while opposing the profit system? Mr. Richberg and Mr. Darrow are issuing statement after statement in the press attacking each other and denouncing each other as Socialists. This is the first truth that has come out in regard to these "brain trusters" and the N.R.A., for when Socialists fall out, the truth will prevail. They are not Democrats at all and never have been Democrats. They are no more Jeffersonian Democrats than any member of the Socialist Party. They do not believe in the profit system, and this is why you can draw a little satisfaction out of the present situation. It is nothing more than the pot calling the kettle black. It is nothing more than two Socialists in the Democratic Party repudiating each other and both of them against the profit system. I say to my friends of the Democratic Party that they are doing more to hinder recovery in America by undermining our institutions and the faith of the American people in our industrial system. If you would stand on Democratic principles and on your party platform with the many hundreds of Democrats competent to hold key positions, you could go out and restore confidence in the country by repudiating these Socialists and these socialistic doctrines. Confidence would soon be reestablished, and we would not have to lend this $300,000,000 to industries in order to get them back on their feet. But as long as radicals and Socialists dominate Democratic policies, there will be no restoration of business confidence.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The gentleman states that these socialistic "brain trusters" are the ones who are hindering recovery under our administration. You did not have these men or men of socialistic tendencies under your administration, and I wish the gentlemen would tell us what it was that prevented him, under his own administration, from starting us back on the road to recovery. [Applause].

Mr. FISH. That is very easy to answer.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. I do not believe the distinguished and able Member of the House was in the Congress in 1930. The Republican President at that time, Herbert Hoover, made certain constructive and sound recommendations to a Democratic Congress, and the Democrats simply threw them out of the window.

The only thing they upheld was the Reconstruction Finance Corporation program, and they enacted that into law. We are operating under that today and providing $300,000,000 more to continue the use of that constructive vehicle. The other recommendations made, such as balancing the Budget, cutting down expenses, and the sales tax, were thrown out of the window.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No. I have only 3 minutes more, and I do not yield. There has been a good deal of talk recently about Rexford Guy Tugwell, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, a charming and intelligent man, and one whom anyone would like to meet. But he belongs to the same Socialist organization; he belongs to the League for Industrial Democracy, which has for its main object a new social order based on production for use and not for profit.

Of course, now that he wants to be appointed to a higher position, Under Secretary of Agriculture, he has changed his color somewhat like the chameleon and talks about democracy and its virtues, forgetting for the time being his socialistic views and written statements.

> The Devil was sick, the Devil a monk would be;
> The Devil was well, The Devil a monk was he.

He has this to say in his last book, Our Economic Society and Its Problems:

> Just as it was impossible for our Union to exist half slave and half free, so it may become impossible for the world to exist half socialistic and half capitalistic. And there are many who believe that capitalism in its nineteenth century and present form would prove a weaker system than the system being developed by the Soviet Union.
> Socialism involves the public ownership of the means of production and the control of economic activity by society. Communism today has the same goal as socialism but differs in that it seeks to attain socialization by means of a dictatorship of the proletariat. In Russia we may observe both, as well as the most complete examples of economic planning.

The trouble with Mr. Tugwell and many other public officeholders is that they do not believe in the profit system and do believe in regimentation and collectivism as practiced and exemplified in Soviet Russia. [Applause.]

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, this is a happy day for this Congress in that the House is about to adopt the measure which is the final link necessary in the general program to put America back on its feet.

The main purpose of this bill is the rehabilitation of small businesses and small industries. The small industries are the backbone of America. We can name 40 or 50 large industries in America and think that we have covered the entire field of industry in this country. As a matter of fact, in every town, in every village of this great Nation there are small industries upon which these towns and villages depend for their security and for their economic well-being. These industries and small businesses have been weathering a storm, and it ill behooves anyone discussing the subject to inject partisan politics.

This Congress is passing legislation without interest in the political fealty of those who will reap the benefits. It has for its one purpose insuring them an opportunity for continued existence.

In the enactment of this measure there are features which are particularly for the benefit of the little fellow. This is unlike the former Congresses, only caring for the big fellow. In this bill it is the little fellow who is recognized, so that he may have a chance to keep his 5 or 15 or 25 employees on the job.

In my own State I know that there are from 50 to 60 small industrialists who need approximately $2,000,000 so that they can continue the employment of from 12,000 to 15,000 people whose future is hanging by a thin thread. This money allocated to them will within 90 days add from 10 to 15 percent to Connecticut employment rolls. This bill should have been passed in the early days of this session. Back in the early part of February I introduced a measure similar to the one we have before us.

Today, in very much the original form of my bill, we have this much-needed legislation. During the last several months I have received personal calls, telegrams, and letters from hundreds of small business men the country over urging that I continue to give my untiring energy to this legislation. In the beginning I found powerful opposition both in and out of Congress. As the need became more imperative and the cries of sinking business from everywhere rolled into a thunderous demand the opposition gradually was worn down. Our great President took a hand. His was one of the first letters of assurance I received. He called conference after conference at the White House. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Governor of the Federal Reserve bank, and many others bent their energies and lent themselves to the work in behalf of legislation to extend the credit of the Government to the aid of industry and business.

The historic moment has arrived. From every community in the United States large and small business men and industrialists are turning hopefully to Washington. In a few hours the vote will be taken. That the bill will be passed I have no doubt. Again the Seventy-third Congress will record itself as having adopted another bill which concerns itself with the saving of millions of our people who need the Government's protecting arm in this critical hour.

These loans under the provisions of this bill will only be made to such concerns as can demonstrate their ability to pay back dollar for dollar what the Government lends. This is a fact which has never been questioned at any time in the consideration of this matter in the Congress. I feel certain that these loans will be proven to be the safest of any made by any department of the Government.

I particularly call your attention to the fact that up to the present time loans to business have not reached those who should have our first concern. The best way to restore prosperity is to see to it that the little fellow is taken care of. The way must be made easy for him or else he cannot do his part toward keeping his employees in jobs.

When public relief comes to an end, as it must some day, where will the worker turn for a job? Naturally, he must turn to private industry. But if private industry has been choked and cannot continue because of lack of funds, then what is going to happen?

As I see it, private industry alone must be the agency to provide permanent employment just as it did before the depression came upon us. But private industry must have stimulation and encouragement to go on. We must not fail to give it the help for which it is crying.

Thousands are watching our action today. Thousands would have been foreclosed and wiped out long before this but for the fact that they have been hopefully waiting for Congress to release Government aid to them.

A few weeks ago I had a letter from a man, who is conducting a printing plant in a small town, telling me that unless this legislation were speedily enacted, his business would be wiped out. There was a balance due in the amount of $1,600 on a mortgage which was held on his plant and equipment. Unless he was able to pay the entire balance by May 4, the plant was to be taken over and his business destroyed.

I wrote the concern which held the mortgage on his plant urging leniency, at least until Congress acted, in the hope that this body might pass this legislation, thus enabling this printer to obtain the small sum of $1,600 which he needs to carry on. I received a letter from the concern telling me that they would hold off to see what action Congress would take. This morning I received the following letter from the printer:

MAY 21, 1934.

Hon. HERMAN P. KOPPLEMAN,
Representative First District of Connecticut,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KOPPLEMAN: Words cannot express to you my gratitude of your personal interest and successful endeavor which you so magnificently have instituted in my behalf, but permit me respectfully to thank you most sincerely for what you have done for me to help me save my printing establishment, my only salvation by which to support my family and maintain my established record as a citizen.

Naturally after being laid up for so long and nothing done for an income it will take me some time to recover, but being on the road to recovery both physically as well as with prospect of new business, it means a lot and with God's help it will be done.

Yes, I am indeed glad of the news received from you and in the papers regarding the industrial loan prospect. I trust it will soon become law and be of help to many who are striving hard under pressure similar to mine or for the lack of capital to proceed in business.

It is indeed gratifying to follow the progress made for the reestablishment of the American people during the past year of Congress activities. My prayers are for you all and I trust in God's mercy that America may remain the leading nation of the world, with freedom to work and live a respectable life for all, maintain respectable homes and that contentment, love, and joy may soon fill the hearts of our people.

Again thanking you, honorable sir, for your help, and please demand me in your service should opportunity permit, I shall never forget this help; and if at any time I can do something for you, please say the word.

When this bill has become law, gentlemen, each one of you will be receiving many letters of this nature from constituents who have long despaired of carrying on the businesses they have labored for years to build up.

This bill recognized a grave emergency and seeks to go direct to the root of the difficulty. Our problem is not that alone of putting more men to work, but also the problem of keeping the men now employed at work.

I have before me a letter of one manufacturer, who writes:

Indications from increasingly heavy mails, with good volume of orders coming in and intensive activity of our sales force, give us encouragement in the belief that if we can only finance the beginning of this heavier production we shall be well on our way in increasing employment and activity.

Many long-established firms that have conducted an ethical and honorable business, earning small but consistent profits, have returned these profits to plant expansion to perpetuate their business. After 4 years of depression they are feeling the pinch of lack of working capital. In better days they have been accustomed to turn to the regular sources of credit, the local banks, but now, in spite of the adequacy of their security, they are unable to obtain a dollar of credit. They have valuable plants, orders on hand, but not the wherewithal to execute these orders. They face ruin while just within the reach of prosperity.

I am told by Connecticut manufacturers that many of them have had to refuse orders, thereby keeping men from employment, because they cannot get bank assistance to fill orders.

I take but two towns in my district where the chambers of commerce have written me urging the enactment of this legislation.

One letter advises me that loans have been requested by small business interests, including commercial houses and small factories aggregating $500,000. I am further informed that if these credit loans are made available, 519 persons would be continued in employment and additional people employed, earning a weekly wage of $10,657.

In the second town, 4 out of 6 factories need immediate help. They have requested a total of $50,000 to keep at work 500 now employed and to reemploy 250 more.

These amounts are insignificant when compared to the millions that have been loaned by the Government to larger industrial concerns, but these amounts, if given, will enable whole towns to keep going. In my district there are many towns whose entire existence is dependent upon the operation of two or three factories or mills.

In a third town in my district there was a paper company which had been in operation continuously for 35 years. Even during the past 4 years when this concern was especially hard pressed by the depression, it managed to keep working from 150 to 200 people. The entire town was dependent upon the operations of this factory.

Early in this year the local bank became insistent upon the payment of the company's loan, amounting entirely to $36,000. A similar amount was owing to merchandise creditors. Every effort was made to obtain leniency on the part of the bank, to no avail. Finally, the bank ordered liquidation of this concern, thus throwing out of employment 150 people and destroying a business which had built up an enviable reputation in its 35 years of existence. When these 150 people were thrown out of work it meant that 150 families dependent upon their earnings were forced to the relief rolls, because other employment in that community could not be found.

If this concern could have obtained the money it needed, there was every certainty that it could have met its obligations, and by the fall of this year begin to show a profit from its operations. The tragic part of this situation is that when liquidation has been completed and all the obligations cleaned up, the company will still be in a perfectly solvent condition. Could this concern receive some sort of direct loan as provided for in this legislation, it will be able to resume its operations. In the meantime, its machines are idle, its door closed, and 150 families in a small community are destitute.

Let me close with a few excerpts from letters I have received on this subject.

If at the present time I had at my disposal $2,000, I could put 10 more men to work and take them off the welfare list. I could keep them going for 6 months or more, but by the time this bill passes (if it does) it will be too late to be of any help to me. Nevertheless, I certainly hope that it passes, as it will do others good. I am living up to the N.R.A. to a letter.

Here is another:

Your H.R. 7666, is very appealing to me, as I met with dismal failure when I applied for a loan of but $12,000, and was turned down. That is why we did not take on some 70 skilled electricians. The factory is still closed.

Record: Always paid dividends. Land, building, machinery, all free and clear—value, $35,000. Wanted but $12,000 to start production, on many orders, some of which were for United States Government. Application turned down.

Here is another:

Ours is not the problem alone of putting more men to work but the problem of keeping the men now employed at work. We stressed this point very strongly in our application, that individually our problem is insignificant, but collectively there are thousands of manufacturers throughout the country similar to us, which add up to a tremendous figure. To permit a great many of these manufacturers to discontinue operations on account of lack of financial assistance would go a long way toward nullifying the benefits of the N.R.A.

My opinion, after the treatment I have received from the local banks, simmers down to just this: For some years past banks loaned to concerns who were poor risks. In order to protect their own poor investment, they were forced to put more money into these concerns to keep them going. Competitive concerns were given no loans and the banks were putting out of business the deserving manufacturer who was not forced to ask for loans until the depression came upon it. Until the Government can allow small deserving concerns to get loans through them, industry will remain at a standstill. Take a survey of the United States; you will find it is the small industry which makes up the greater part of it, yet large industry can get millions to continue on. Farms have been saved, homes, etc., yet the most deserving of them all—small industry—has been allowed to sink for the want of a small amount in loans with which to carry them through and keep their men employed.

The writer feels that one of the surest ways to help eliminate the necessity of appropriating enormous amounts of public funds for relief purposes is to provide working capital for industries in a position—and many can so demonstrate—to use these funds advantageously, transferring people from relief to industry pay rolls.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, a little earlier in the afternoon a question was raised in connection with one provision of the bill dealing with loans to drainage and levee and irrigation districts. I am drawing entirely on memory, but if I remember the text of the provision in the Agricultural Adjustment Act whereby we first made available $50,000,000 for drainage districts, we also wrote into that act a provision that none of the money was to be used for expansion purposes and for bringing under tillage additional acreage. When the Interior appropriation bills were before this Congress, I believe the members of the committee and the subcommittee will bear me out, we wrote into those bills specifically that money should not be used in tilling additional acreage over and above that now existing in the country. The $50,000,000 that has been increased to $125,000,000 in this bill, is going to be used to refinance existing drainage districts. My good friend and contemporary from Kansas made the point that that was not essentially a business. When 50 or 60 farmers get together and take commitments of 2 or 3 or 4 or 5 thousand or even 10,000 acres of land, go through the procedure of the county court, erect earthen levees to keep out the water, dig ditches, build pumping stations to keep down the water table in the land, tile it, have commissioners appointed who are under the jurisdiction of the county court, does it not seem that that is a business in the strict sense of the word? Then why should not the hundreds, even thousands of drainage districts that have been so organized, that are suffering from depressed agriculture prices, not be given the benefit of a bill of this kind.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Does the gentleman think this character of loan is safe to the Government under the present condition of those districts over the country?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman means so far as the drainage districts are concerned?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In view of the fact that in almost every instance mortgages have been scaled down and bondholders have been willing to deal with the owners of the land in order to make it possible for them to continue to till the land, I am reasonably sure that on the reduced valuation it is an entirely safe loan.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Everywhere I know anything about it they are insolvent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How could they be otherwise than insolvent? How can districts in my State, for instance, where they had mortgages and assessments of as much as $100 to $125 per acre that accrued in addition to the general taxes and the original cost of the land, be otherwise than insolvent when corn was bringing 16 cents per bushel? It is simply not in the cards that they should be otherwise. But things have been placed on a more reasonable and moderate basis, and there has been a scaling down in the indebtedness, and they come up to approximately more nearly the value of the land, and I believe these are entirely safe. After all, let me ask the gentleman from Texas, is there any better security in the country than a piece of the real estate of that country?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. These irrigation districts had the benefit of a moratorium recently, did they not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not believe so.

Mr. CULKIN. Did we not pass a bill in the House that extended the payment of interest over the whole field of reclamation and irrigation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. You could not do that so far as private drainage districts are concerned. Doubtless you are referring to water districts in the Western States.

Mr. CULKIN. Assuming that is so, it is a confession of insolvency.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Nobody makes any question about that.

Mr. CULKIN. So you are going to loan money to insolvent irrigation districts?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They are insolvent only insofar as inflated values are concerned.

Mr. CULKIN. What I am interested in is this proposition. I realize the difficulty in which these people find themselves who got onto these projects mistakingly under the impetus of propaganda from the Interior Department. Does this include any new projects?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not believe it does. In fact, I am sure it does not. It is nothing more than an amendment to the original act.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman on the committee?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; but I gave special attention to it at the time the original bill was under consideration.

Mr. DRIVER. The original bill provided that it was only existing districts at that time that were affected. The gentleman talks about a moratorium. That was only on the water rights; it was not on the bonds, the outstanding securities of the district in existence, but only on the charges to the existing districts for the water furnished to the users.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. That pertains to districts which the Government built.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right.

Mr. PIERCE. It was not privately owned districts.

Mr. DRIVER. That is correct also.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. When the court is arguing with you, a lawyer ought to keep still. We gentlemen from the West certainly appreciate the attitude of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], but I want to say to some of the other gentlemen that to deny these drainage and irrigation districts the relief afforded by this amendment is tantamount to pronouncing the death sentence on them economically.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely.

Now, in the few moments that remain I want to bring one matter to the attention of the members of the committee. There is not a Member of this House who probably has not been supplicated by some of his constituents who have made application for a farm loan, who in many instances have had to wait 5, 6, 7, or 8 months for action, and sometimes a foreclosure was obtained and the man's estate lost. It occurs to me that when a recommendation is made by the advisory committee and the same action is had by the Federal Reserve bank in connection with the loan provision of this bill it would not be amiss to write in there that summary action and disposition of an application must obtain not later than 60 days after the application has been filed. What good does it do when a man is in difficulty and needs working and operating capital in his business to have to carry on, waiting for all the procedure and the red tape that too often is involved in an application of that kind, and then find that the money comes too late for him to make a prudent or timely expansion of his business or to augment his pay roll or do all these other things that are so necessary for recovery? It seems to me that any Federal Reserve bank, any advisory committee could inform itself of the facts and make summary disposition of every case within 60 days after the application is filed. I should like to see that kind of an amendment to this bill.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Suppose they get a thousand applications immediately, how could they handle them all in 60 days?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They should have sufficient machinery to do it, I will say. Moreover, applications could not be filed until the administrative machinery has been set up. Sixty days should therefore be ample time.

Mr. REILLY. But we must leave something to the discretion of the Board.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But we left so much to the Farm Credit Administration——

Mr. REILLY. Does the gentleman know that hundreds of thousands of mortgages have already been handled by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say that I do, but, however, the gentleman has probably had the same experience I have had, in having a great many of these things jockeyed around month after month, all because of some fancied appraisal that they would not make. There is not a Member of this House who does not have farmers in despair and difficulty because the appraisers of the Farm Credit Administration and the mortgagee cannot get together on the value.

Mr. REILLY. That is not the case in Wisconsin.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If we are going to have these differences appear with respect to the valuation of property and soundness of the security offered by some person who makes application for a loan under this bill, what assurance is there that these small business institutions will not be jockeyed around in precisely the same fashion? I am heartily in favor of this bill. I have got a dozen out there who are ready to put in their applications the day the President affixes his signature, but I want to see that it is not hamstrung, covered up with red tape, covered up with procedural difficulties that will chase them all over the country, and after 6 months of heart-breaking effort, find it was nothing except a rainbow and that it did not mean anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], has expired.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

DIRECT LOANS TO INDUSTRY

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill as it came from the other body could not be considered a bill providing for direct loans to industry. It provided that the Federal Reserve banks may extend loans to industry under certain exceptional circumstances. They have that power now, and they have had that power in the past. Practically, the only difference is that the paper may extend as long as 5 years under the new proposal. It makes no difference whether it is 1 year or 5 years, the Federal Reserve banks will not make those loans. We know that.

BONUS OF $140,000,000 TO FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

In addition to that provision in the bill coming from the other body, there was another provision which gave to the Federal Reserve banks of this country a bonus, a pure bonus, a gift, a subsidy of approximately $140,000,000. In addition to that, there was a provision which permitted the Federal Reserve Board to build a separate institution from the Government of the United States, get out of the Treasury entirely, build their own building in Washington, D.C., over which they will have exclusive control, at an expense of a million dollars. That is the kind of bill that came to this House from the Senate. I want to commend this committee, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] is chairman, for making a real bill out of the Senate bill that was sent to this House.

REFUSAL OF LOANS BY BANKS

There is a provision in the bill, as amended by the House committee, permitting Federal Reserve banks to extend loans if they want to, but no gift of $140,000,000. Under the terms of this bill, if it is enacted into law, your constituent will not be required to show the R.F.C. that he went to his member bank and presented certain evidence of solvency and adequacy of security; he will not be required to show that he went to the Federal Reserve bank and tried to get accommodations there other than to make the statement to the representative of the R.F.C., "I have been to these different institutions, and I cannot get the kind of loan I need for a reasonable price, and I am coming to you." Such a statement will be sufficient for the R.F.C. representative to deal with that person and extend to him a direct loan.

GOOD BILL

This is a good bill. I would extend it from a limit of $100,000 to a limit of $1,000,000, because I know that the R.F.C. cannot safely lend more than $300,000,000 between now and January 31; and since $300,000,000 is enough, even with $1,000,000 loans—there will be a few of them—let us put the money out and let these $1,000,000 loans be extended if needed and adequate security is offered. Of course, preference should be given to small loans.

REAL FIGHT LATER ON

The real fight on this bill will come when it goes to conference, and I want to warn the Members of the House right now that ever since the Federal Reserve Banking Act was enacted at practically every session one chiseling amendment after another has been enacted by Congress until the Federal Reserve has ceased to be the institution it was supposed to be and has become a profit-making institution for private banks owned by private corporations, using the Nation's credit free of charge, without even paying taxes on their transactions, and without paying the Government of the United States a penny on earth. There is another chiseling amendment which will be proposed in the conference. As I say, the real fight is not here; but when this bill goes to conference I have every reason to believe that the other body is going to insist that you give these Federal Reserve banks a bonus of $140,000,000, that you let the Federal Reserve get away from the Treasury of the United States and construct its own building, at an expense of $1,000,000 to start on, and get out from under the same roof with the Government's representatives. They will insist on these provisions or not agree to direct loans to industry. As for myself I will have no bill before I will have the Federal Reserve bonus bill that was passed by the other body. [Applause.]

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I expect to support this bill because I believe that under its provisions the R.F.C. will be changed from an institution set up to loan money in the main to the bigger interests of the country into one designed to loan money to the small industries of the United States. I am convinced that this new policy will serve to diffuse in a broad way the great blocks of capital that the Congress has been giving that institution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman uses the term "small business." Will the gentleman explain what he means by a small business? Will the garage man, the summer-resort man, the person who owns a small sawmill or planing mill, be in a position to borrow from the Government?

Mr. FORD. As I read the provisions of this bill any individual, partnership, or corporation can go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and upon the presentation of proper and adequate security get a loan with which to conduct his, their, or its business if by so doing an increase of employment can be shown.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was praised highly by a distinguished Member [Mr. FISH] on the other side of the aisle. I can agree with the gentleman that it has been one of the factors that have contributed a great deal to help in this emergency. It saved the great insurance companies, whose failure would have been a calamity to the entire country. It saved great banks, whose failure would have been a calamity in their particular sections of the country, but it did not save all of them. It saved the railroads, which were on the verge of stopping operations. For these reasons it did a great service to the Nation; it kept the wheels of transportation turning to a great extent; it kept the great banking institutions operating; and it kept the great insurance companies solvent so that the beneficiaries of the policies felt reasonably certain that in the event of the death of the assured the policy would be paid. Even though it accomplished all this, there was still one field not open for it to enter under the provisions of the act, and that is the field of making loans to small industries, loans to help the average, the common man.

In this connection I shall support an amendment that will be offered to enable the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan to cities or governmental subdivisions desiring to purchase existing utility facilities in order that they may provide power to their people at a lower rate, providing those cities are taking power from one of the great power-producing units in which the Government has invested its money. By incorporating such a provision in the bill we will work a double self-liquidating plan, for we will enable the city which is to sell power to its people to liquidate its indebtedness and we will be assisting the United States Government to liquidate the investment it now has in these vast power enterprises by giving them additional customers for the power, thus enabling these investments to be liquidated and assuring a return to the United States Treasury of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the happiest days of my life, legislatively speaking. I have long been an advocate of this sort of legislation. I think the Committee on Banking and Currency is entitled to the highest praise for bringing in a splendid work of constructive statesmanship.

I believe this bill will do more than any other that has been passed at this session of Congress to restore normalcy and to relieve unemployment in the United States.

I was brought into this picture as the result of numerous applications to me, in my representative capacity, by business concerns of Indianapolis, Ind., which, in part, I have the honor to represent, who found themselves entirely unable to proceed with employment and operations because of their inability to secure funds from the banks for working capital. I presume I have as many as 50 such applications.

The district I represent perhaps includes as many as a thousand factories which are prostrate, because they are literally starving for working capital.

I believe, gentlemen, that there is one road, and only one road, that leads to industrial normalcy and unemployment relief on a large scale. There is only one way to revive stagnant business, start the wheels whirling, and give self-respecting men jobs that will enable them to earn a living for themselves and their families.

The way to do that is for the Federal Government to make loans to good, solvent concerns that have ample security, but no working capital with which to start operations. Half a billion dollars loaned direct to industry would create at least a billion-dollar pay roll in the year 1934.

We have already spent, or committed ourselves to spend, more than six times that sum on uneconomic public works that have not made a dent on the unemployment situation. Think how many men could be taken off the relief pay rolls and placed in steady jobs with a pay roll of a billion dollars.

"Start the factories" is the best slogan I can think of at this time. It would fit our economic situation like a glove, and would round out the President's program, opening the way for absorption into normal employment of millions now engaged in civil works. It would give business men and manufacturers a chance to operate, and it would afford millions the welcome opportunity they are seeking to earn a living in normal employment and not at the expense of the taxpayers.

I sincerely believe, gentlemen, that unless some bill embodying this principle is passed by this Congress, there will be an indefinite continuation of the industrial paralysis that grips the country, and that the situation will become increasingly serious, because no way will be provided to absorb into normal employment the multitudes that have been engaged in civil works.

I believe the time has come in the development of our national program when we should cease spending, except for immediate and necessary relief, and should devote our thought to the advancement of recovery through natural processes.

Let us make it possible for natural laws to operate in putting the country on its feet.

I have asked for an allotment of time in this debate to call the attention of the House and the country to what I believe to be the importance of this proposition now before this Congress as an aid—I may say an indispensable aid—to the restoration of normal business activities and the resumption of employment, and that is a wisely safeguarded provision whereby direct loans may be made through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to reliable firms and corporations for working capital to start the wheels of industry. On the opening day of the present session of Congress I introduced a bill which follows:

To aid in the resumption and carrying on of normal business and industrial activities, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make direct loans to approved firms and corporations, such loans in all cases to be made under proper safeguards and to be based on securities that are adequate to guarantee repayment of principal and interest in full: Provided, That such loans shall be limited to providing funds for working capital.

That bill embodies the principle embodied in the legislation we are now considering.

I think it is quite clear that here is the way toward industrial normalcy. Here is the program that will erect the bridge between civil works and regular employment. Industry stands ready to do its part, but industry cannot do its part because, speaking broadly, it has no working capital. I am referring now not to the enormous businesses that may be better fortified financially, but of the thousands upon thousands of smaller concerns that make up the bone and sinew of the American business fabric. They have valuable assets, but no money to buy raw materials and to pay work hands, and if they take their securities to a bank to pledge them for working capital they cannot borrow a dime.

And be it said to the credit of these thousands upon thousands of business and manufacturing concerns that they are 100 percent patriotic and want to do their full duty toward lifting their country out of its distress. There is no doubt about that. Given an opportunity to borrow working capital, they will call the multitudes now on relief into the factories and workshops. Smoke will start in the factory chimneys, the wheels will whirl once more, and business will begin to hum.

So I say, without criticizing the recovery program up to date, because it has been more or less a process of doing the best one knew how to do and trusting to luck, the time unmistakably has come when we should cease spending and begin lending; when the dollars of Uncle Sam should be loaned for working capital to reliable concerns on unimpeachable security with a warranty that ultimately every dollar will come back with interest to the Federal Treasury. This is a way to lend the credit of the Government to business and industry on a gigantic scale with assurance in advance of benefit to millions of people. This is a form of Government assistance that is sound and logical.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARLEY].

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Chairman, most of the time in general debate has been spent in talking about loans to small industries. I want to call attention to one part of the bill of which slight mention has so far been made, and that is the section which broadens the powers of the R.F.C. to facilitate exports and imports.

We must have an outlet for the things which we manufacture and produce in America. It is a known fact that the facilities for export need this assistance at the present time and have needed it for many years. It has been to our discredit for some time that the Government of the United States and our financing institutions were so poorly built up to finance exports and imports from and to other countries. It is a very necessary thing, and is a commendable part of this measure and should stand as is.

Something has been said about the limit of $100,000 to be loaned to any one industry and that this amount should be increased. We all know that there are human frailties, and in the administrative forces it is much easier to have one customer with whom to correspond, keep books for, and be in touch with than it is to have 10. When the $100,000 limit was put in this bill it was for the sole purpose of reaching out and helping the smaller industries of the country. This provision should prevail.

I have had a great deal of pleasure in working on this bill and in working with the committee who gave so much time to the consideration of it, and, to my mind, it is the keystone in the arch of the reconstruction program. I am very happy to be a party to its enactment. [Applause.]

And likewise all the constructive legislation enacted since Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated President of the United States, and what a busy administration it has been. There is probably no parallel in the history of American Government which equals it. The first administration of Woodrow Wilson was looked upon as one of outstanding accomplishments and of many fundamental changes in our governmental questions, but it pales into insignificance when compared with the year that is just closing. This past year will undoubtedly go down in history as an administration that properly and successfully consummated more fundamental changes in our governmental policies than any in the past. From the time Mr. Roosevelt made his inaugural address at the east door of the Capitol and said, "What the country demands, and demands now, is action", even his friends and admirers were not aware that he was a man of such action as he displayed the moment he repeated from memory the oath of office administered to him by Chief Justice Hughes at exactly 1:08 on the afternoon of March 4; and from that time every hour of the day has been crowded with chapters of vivid action. No one could have been present on that memorable occasion without having been fully charged with the idea that here is a man who knows what it is all about, who has a heart that beats in sympathy with all classes of American people, and has courage enough to execute the thoughts of his mind and feelings of his heart.

Within a few hours on that same day, a new Cabinet, composed mostly of men and women unknown to the Nation, were sworn into their respective positions. On the following morning, before we were aware of it, he called into extraordinary special session the Congress of the United States and at the same time proclaimed the national bank holiday. The financial institutions of the country were crumbling. There was a wide-spread feeling of impending disaster.

Various influences good and bad were at work in the country, and even the most optimistic persons could see very little ahead but gloom and shadows. He and his advisers set about at once to restore equilibrium in the banking structure, and from that bank holiday there came an opportunity for the refinancing and reorganizing of the banking structure throughout the length and breadth of the land, so broad and workable that on January 1, 1934, only 5 percent of all banks in existence that desired it were denied admission into the banking-insurance provisions. In my own district much has been accomplished in that direction. It is not necessary that I at this time uncover any of the unfortunate remembrances of what was going on in northeast Indiana. I have confidence in business men and always have had. I am not one who presumes that because a man is a banker he is necessarily a rogue and dishonest. Some of the finest men in character and mentality have been identified with these progressive institutions. They were just reaping the reward, not entirely of their own choosing, which mania had been provided on the part of stockholders and investors, and many things were done which they thought were wise at the time that proved in the end to be disastrous.

It has been my pleasure to serve on the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, in which capacity I have had opportunity to see 85 percent of the constructive financial bills go over our table. This has given me an opportunity for a wider study of the situation than normal, and if I have done nothing more for my district in my short term in Congress than to assist the banks of this district back to a better and safer basis, I shall be very happy in its remembrance for years to come.

When the deposit guarantee bill was being considered in committee there was some demand for it, but it was an unorganized demand, and there was likewise very strong organized opposition to it. When the bill was first introduced it was intended that it should not become operative until July 1, 1934, but a provision was placed in the law making it possible for Executive order to make it become effective earlier, and the President set the figure of $2,500 as a maximum on which the Corporation would insure these deposits.

We were told that a number of State banks in the West had tried the guaranty banking plan and that it had failed. Careful investigation into the cause of that failure was that it was not properly organized and adequately financed. In this new set-up, sufficient money direct from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and from the Federal Reserve banks has been allocated to the Corporation, together with the assessments on the stocks of the banks themselves, that makes this look like a success. Up to the present time in the session of Congress now being held there has not yet appeared before our committee any group protesting the continuance of this guaranty deposit, but there have been many corporations demanding that it will continue and that the provisions be made stronger, and I have a feeling that for many years to come this will be one of the safeguards to American bankers which both the bankers and the people want. Deposits have increased $2,000,000,000 since the first of the year, and the Deposit Insurance Corporation is making a million dollars per month and have not yet had a bank failure.

There has been much complaint of funds going out of banks to Postal Savings. Postal Savings accounts were increased by over $106,000,000 over a period of 30 days, beginning March 1, 1933, and now, with this law effective, there is very little or no use for Postal Savings. There are approximately 700 counties in the United States that have no banking facilities, and if it were not for these 700 counties, I am inclined to think that the interest rate would be reduced to a point where no one would care to have their investment in that direction.

On March 9, Congress convened in special session and put their stamp of approval by legislation on the emergency-banking program.

On March 11 the economy measure was passed by the House, and 4 days later by the Senate.

There has been wide condemnation of the Economy Act. To be sure this act did do some things that we later have found were too drastic, but to you who have taken time for investigation and know the wide-spread abuse that had grown around the various agencies receiving money from the Federal Government, you know this had to be done. We were told in the beginning that many of these measures were of an emergency nature, and most of the legislation passed terminates of its own accord on specified dates.

We have men now who are asking for the repeal of the entire Economy Act simply because they have a feeling it is too effective in one direction; but when you take the program as a whole, I still think that the President was wise in asking for this authority, and, with his sympathetic nature, the various injuries that seem to have been done are being corrected.

On March 13 national banks were reopened. The following day stock exchanges reopened, with stocks advancing in price; hoarded gold began pouring back to banks, along with streams of hoarded currency.

In the meantime, the beer bill had passed the House and later the Senate, which made it become effective 1 minute after midnight on April 6. One of the outstanding issues of the last campaign was fought out on the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the modification of the Volstead Act. We are not so far away from the result of the action in Congress on that subject that we cannot carefully weigh what was done. I have said, and repeat it, that the people who are interested in genuine, true temperance have a tremendous task before them to regain the ground which was lost in the years of Volsteadism. Unusual action is always followed by reaction. One always chills more readily after a period of vigorous exercise, and I am hopeful that this liberty restored to the American people will not be abused, and that we shall have growing into maturity young men and women who are temperate and courageous.

I was severely criticized by various interests for my statement in opposition to the Federal Farm Board. I could not see where it had been of any advantage to the American farmer, and was very happy when on the 27th day of March the President abolished the Board and united all farm agencies into one administration. We are making progress toward the relief of the American farmer; and while there is justified complaint that the machinery is not active, namely, the Federal farm banks are not acting liberally enough to relieve the distress of the American farmer, we are making progress in that direction, and many millions of dollars are being loaned each day to refinance farm mortgages, and you will see this agency speeded up from this time forward.

On March 31 Mr. Roosevelt set up the Civilian Conservation Corps to employ 300,000 idle men. That seemed like a gigantic undertaking, but I think we have all lived to realize what one of my Republican colleagues said in the House recently, "that one of the finest pieces of Executive order was the establishment of these camps" that took these thousands of idle young men from cities and towns and put them out into God's open country to useful work. On December 21, Robert Fechner, Director of Emergency Conservation work, issued a statement, which in part follows:

I have today forwarded to President Roosevelt a complete statistical report outlining the major forestry projects completed by the men of the Civilian Conservation Corps and the Indian conservation camps during the first 6 months' enrollment period ending September 30, 1933. The report, covering a tremendous volume of construction and improvement work, carried the first complete figures showing forestry army accomplishments for the whole Nation. In making public the work achievements of the 300,000 men sent to forestry camps as a part of the President's general relief and national recovery program, Director Fechner asserted that the work record made by the young foresters was one in which the whole country can take pride. He asserted that all past records for forest protection and forest improvement work completed in any one year in the United States by Federal and State forces had been greatly surpassed by the forest army of 1933.

The report, compiled from official work records prepared at the 1,522 camps where the men of the Civilian Conservation Corps and the 8,000 Indians of the Indian conservation camps labored during the summer and fall discloses that the work done will benefit large sections of the 600,000,000 acres of forest and park lands in this country. The benefits of forest improvement, forest protection, soil erosion, and park improvement are not confined to the immediate acres where the men worked, but are spread over millions of acres of adjoining lands. The figures show that 12,671 miles of trails were built, that the men constructed 68,000 soil-erosion dams, spent 400,000 days fighting forest fires, built 4,229 bridges, planted trees on more than 25,000 acres, and began planting operations on an additional 50,000 acres.

Disease-control work was completed on 1,675,000 acres, rodent-control work on 3,566,918 acres, and insect-pest-control work on 800,153 acres, and poisonous-plant-control work on 47,459 acres.

The great bulk of the work done was accomplished during the months of July, August, and September, as the strength of the forestry army did not reach its peak of around 300,000 until the middle of July. The report does not include the large amount of forest work that has been done in October, November, and thus far this month, as accurate figures on this period are not yet available. The work was done under the supervision of the forestry experts of the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, and the 47 States where the men were located. Twenty-eight camps containing 5,600 veterans did flood-control work under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department. Of the 1,522 camps in the continental United States, 1,250 were under the supervision of the Forest Service, 175 under the Office of National Parks, Buildings, and Reservations, 71 under the Bureau of Indian Affairs, 28 under the Chief of Engineers, 3 under the Bureau of Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture, and 1 under the General Land Office.

Improvements done by the C.C.C. men and the Indians will prove of permanent value to the forests. The forest resources of the Nation have been given new and valuable protection from fire, pests, and disease which in the past have taken an annual toll estimated in the hundreds of millions of dollars. Stands of timber have been improved, erosion of land checked, ranges for the great livestock industry improved and recreational facilities for the public multiplied. The value of our national and State forests and our national parks has been greatly enhanced.

I am happy that the program contemplates the continuation of this work for the present summer, and it now looks favorable that the Fourth Congressional District is to have two, and I hope three camps located within its border. On the 28th of April, the Senate passed the farm bill which added the Thomas inflation amendment, granting unusual powers to the President, and likewise, the privilege if he desired, to issue $3,000,000,000 in currency to retire interest-bearing bonds. Up to the present time he has not used that authority and I doubt now whether he contemplates doing it. It was at this time when the question came to the floor of the House to relieve the Government and all others of contracts that were payable in gold. I was one of nine Democrats who voted in opposition to that resolution. Subsequent events show that those in authority themselves were just building up a program that would lead to the final revaluation of the gold dollar.

I sat in the White House conference when that question was discussed and the program outlining the result is known to all of you today. The gold content of the dollar has been reduced and it now looks as if even the strongest opponents, men like Vanderlip of New York, are admitting that the move was not only courageous but that it was wise.

I receive from time to time, many letters out of this district, asking me to work for a parity between gold and silver. I repeat what was said in substance at that White House conference:

Until we have found the wisdom in our act with reference to the devaluation of the gold dollar, there is nothing further that can be done for silver at this time.

I do not pose as a monetary expert, but I do know this, that there must be sufficient currency to take care of business needs and that the dollar must have purchasing power. I think the American dollar is one of the best dollars in the world today and it does buy food and clothing, pays taxes, takes care of interest on investments, and future generations will undoubtedly present their stamp of approval upon this action of our great President at a time when the country was sorely depressed.

On May 12 the bill was signed by the President, creating the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, which contained a provision for $500,000,000 for employment relief, and what a God-send to the Nation that provision has been. That, together with the $400,000,000 allocated from the Public Works funds, has been the nucleus of the Civil Works Administration. The C.W.A. program has been very widely acclaimed and popular. It is hardly possible to conceive what might have happened to this country at large during these winter months if it had not been for that direct relief to the people. Many men who had never known want found relief in this administration. The Fourth Congressional District has been particularly fortunate in that no scandal has attached itself to the administration of these funds. This expenditure of money has given direct relief to every faltering business concern in this city and in the adjoining towns. Just within the last few days we have voted an additional $950,000,000 to be used in this direction and with the Public Works Administration. The P.W.A. program has not yet begun to function in its full strength. The $3,300,000,000 that was appropriated has not yet been spent. Some of it has been, but a large percentage of it is yet to be used, and you will find with the coming of spring that many of these projects which have been approved will start on their road to completion.

What you want, what we all want, is that labor shall have its just reward and an opportunity to earn its daily bread, and I am confident that this program will be continued until such time as men are restored to their former working positions.

I trust that I do not weary you with reciting these events that have happened day by day, but I am anxious to give you a complete picture of just what has happened in this year with Roosevelt.

May 18 the Tennessee Valley Authority bill was signed, ending the 13 years of dispute over the question of the giant costly power, munitions, and fertilizing plants at Muscle Shoals.

On May 26 the National Recovery Administration Act passed the House, carrying with it the appropriation I have already mentioned.

May 27 the securities bill, very much misunderstood, and at present a storm center, was signed. Following in quick succession was the Wagner employment service bill, vetoed by Mr. Hoover.

When we completed our session on the 16th day of June the National Recovery Act, deposit insurance, independent offices bill, dealing with cuts in veterans' benefits, and the deficiency act, had become a reality in law.

I do not have sufficient time to discuss here the N.R.A. and its various workings. There are conferences now being held in the city of Washington at which 7,000 representative men in business and industrial labor have been invited to participate and work out and correct the various codes. This whole scheme so revolutionary of necessity has had some errors and faults, but undoubtedly it will work out to the good of all.

Under this act the Sherman antitrust law becomes almost inoperative, but I have confidence in business integrity in America and do not feel that business men will take advantage of that situation, and while capital profited by the abrogation of a law that had lost its usefulness, labor at the same time won its greatest victory. Each laboring man and every laboring organization in this land has reason to think of, and to praise the day, when the N.R.A. became a law. I likewise have confidence in labor and its leaders, and do not expect and hope that you will not take advantage of this situation, build your organizations not to destroy but to cooperate, because our interests are all identical.

I want to compliment the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the State of Indiana. At Washington they speak of it as one of the most successful in all the States, and when I do this, I want to justly compliment Mr. Stephen B. Fleming for the way he is administering that act in the district to which he has been assigned. There is nothing more disastrous, nothing that will destroy initiative more than for a man to be facing the loss of his home, in many cases the result of a lifetime toil and saving. I am happy that this Home Owners' Loan Corporation is being so successfully operated and that thousands of homes are being saved with a good long time to pay the indebtedness. These loans cannot be made indiscriminately. They must be handled on a safe business basis, because back of it are the bonds that the people must take in return for mortgages, and while there are some who are not getting this relief, in the main every distressed mortgagor will be helped. Just now there are modifications of the law which is permitting them to improve their homes and keep the properties in repair. This is a wise business proposition, as these homes are all owned by one corporation and the bonds that are outstanding are not the bonds on an individual property but the bonds on all of the properties which they hold. I anticipate before this session of Congress is closed that these bonds will be guaranteed as to principle as well as interest.

Agriculture has not yet had its part in this recovery, but it is going to come—it just takes time to work out some of these problems, and if the farmers will cooperate with the various measures that are being worked out you will find that before this year has passed, the prices of the products which you raise will be coming back to normal.

Just now the question of the veterans' compensation is being widely discussed. The four-point program of the Legion is being represented in Washington by a very capable group, but one by one the Executive orders are taking care of these various items.

The Executive order of January 19, which was liberalized practically every phase of this contested question, is beginning to be felt. There is some question even in the Legion about the fourth point of their program. You know, there are widows, who are still drawing pensions, the wives of soldiers who fought in the War of 1812. I am confident that when this legislation which the veterans themselves want is worked out that these various points will have been covered.

I assume you want to know how I feel on the question of the soldiers' bonus, better called "adjusted compensation." I told you in my campaign last year that I favored the settlement of that question whenever it could be done without embarrassment to the Treasury of the United States. I now feel that it can be done. I am confident that some set program is going to be worked out on that subject. As I look upon it, these claims mature in 1945. There is not a business house in this city that does not anticipate its accounts. To many, it is just anticipating our debts we owe to the boys that hold our obligations, and when that bill comes to the floor of the House I expect to vote for its passage.

I have only touched a few of the high spots in the program. Already the confidence of the people in the program has been reflected satisfactorily everywhere.

What seemed to all of us a short year ago as the evening twilight has turned out to be just the dawn of the morning and a new day.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this measure, for it promises relief to the smaller industries of the country, whose pay rolls must be restored if there shall be a return to normal employment. My own home city of Minneapolis, its neighbor St. Paul, Duluth on Lake Superior, and any number of smaller communities throughout Minnesota, including St. Cloud, Stillwater, Mankato, Faribault, Red Wing, and Winona, have literally hundreds of factories that are handicapped by reason of the fact that their working capital has been depleted by 4 years of grinding depression. Many small manufacturers came to me before I left home to attend the present session of Congress, telling me their difficulties. Some of them said they had profitable orders on hand which they could not execute because they lacked, and could not secure through the regular channels, funds for raw material and labor. They had no more security to put up, their line of credit at the banks was exhausted; and so machinery was standing idle, men were unemployed, and interest, taxes, and unavoidable overhead expenses were increasing the red figures on their ledgers.

I can think of nothing the Government could do that would do more to revive business than to furnish assistance to the small manufacturer. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has helped depositors by extending loans to banks; it has saved the people's life insurance by backing the insurance companies, it has insured jobs to thousands of railroad workers and continued transportation service for the whole Nation by coming to the rescue of the carriers. These forms of relief were commendable, they were necessary. But they were no more commendable and necessary than the recovery effort embodied in the present bill.

The committee, in my opinion, acted with prudence and good judgment when it decided to limit the amount to be made available for this purpose to $300,000,000. We must soon stop thinking in terms of billions, and get back to the modest million. Since I became a Member a little over a year ago I have voted "no" on $6,000,000,000 of expenditures authorized by this body. We are perilously approaching the end of national credit and we must soon, as I have warned times without number, husband our credit and taxing power.

Inasmuch as it is necessary to stay within the $300,000,000 limit the committee has imposed, I hope that we shall adhere to its wise decision that no one borrower shall have more than $100,000. That sum will take care of the needs of most small industries. Big corporations can usually get all the credit they need at the banks. Many of the larger companies still have reserves. Obviously if we raise the limit to $1,000,000, as some propose, we shall reduce the number we can help. What this country needs is not so many billion-dollar concerns but more small independent industries, scattered throughout the country. We should therefore reserve the funds provided in this bill for the little fellows.

The provision putting a limit on the salaries of officials receiving Government help is also commendable. Corporations which divert income which should go into reserves or be paid out in wages, or which should be reduced to insure lower prices to the consumer, are not entitle to help from the Government.

The amendment which I understand is to be offered to make a part of this money available for the acquisition of power plants in the Tennessee Valley and on the Pacific coast should not prevail. It is not my purpose to discuss the question of public as against private ownership of utilities. That issue should not enter into this debate. The question here is whether we should make it possible to take a large part of the $300,000,000 intended for the rehabilitation of small industries and use it instead to finance municipalities in two or three comparatively small areas which have already benefited from the National Treasury to the extent of hundreds of millions. I do not believe that power plants, whether publicly or privately owned, should share in this fund, for this fund is intended to help restore employment. A power plant will operate with the same crew whether the State or a corporation owns it. This measure is one for unemployment relief, and every dollar used to finance the power industry in Tennessee, California, or Washington will mean one dollar less for stimulating small industry in Minneapolis, St. Paul, St. Louis, Indianapolis, and Buffalo.

While I am heartily in favor of this bill and will vote for its passage, I want to throw out a few words of caution. I do not believe that the enactment of this legislation should induce too much optimism on the part of those who operate small industries. Under existing laws, many of them could have received assistance through community mortgage associations if those charged with the responsibility of loaning R.F.C. funds had not seen fit in passing on applications to be even more conservative than the officers of commercial banks. It will do no good to pass this bill, or enact any other legislation to extend to business men credit they cannot get through the usual channels, if those charged with the administration of the law conceive it their duty to scrutinize the eligibility of borrowers even more closely than the bankers themselves. I have in mind one case in my own State. Three manufacturers formed a local association and made application for a loan. They were turned down because men here in Washington decided that one of the member corporations was not a good risk, despite the fact that the loan was recommended by an advisory board consisting of three hard-boiled Minneapolis bankers. It is conceded that every effort must be made to avoid losses, and that loans must not be recklessly granted. Nevertheless, it must not be overlooked that the purpose in enacting this and other similar legislation is to make available credit that could not otherwise be obtained and that would not be justified by strict banking practice, and that if this were not so we should not be even considering this bill.

This $300,000,000 is a sum that Uncle Sam is betting on the ability of the small business man to come back, and if it is loaned not only honestly but courageously, I am sure that Uncle Sam will win his bet.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, in view of the splendid explanation of the bill, S. 3487, as amended, which has been presented by the distinguished Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] who served as chairman of the subcommittee appointed to consider various amendments proposed to the Reconstruction Finance Act, it seems almost futile to make any further statement designed to aid the House in forming a conclusion as to the merits of this bill. It has, as you have been advised, the unanimous support of the Committee on Banking and Currency. It does not, however, go as far in its effort to afford relief to deserving business establishments as some of us would like for it to go. It is a compromise in many respects. But if properly and sympathetically administered, it should afford substantial relief to many distressed industrial and commercial enterprises which have been languishing for lack of capital requirements.

The main purpose of the measure is contained in section XI, authorizing the Corporation to make direct loans to any industrial or commercial business established prior to January 31, 1934, when credit at prevailing rates for loans of such type is not available at banks or the Federal Reserve bank in the district of the applicant.

This language may be somewhat confusing, but those of us who know the sincere purpose of the present management of the Corporation entertain no doubt that the relief provided in this amendment will be extended without requiring the usual red tape and an outlay of heavy legal and traveling expense. To qualify, an applicant must show that extension of financial assistance in the way of capital by the Corporation will insure continuing or increased employment. This, to my mind, is the heart of the main feature of the bill. All of us know that there are hundreds of crippled industries and business establishments of the small and medium-sized type which are in dire need of capital with which to carry on and to reestablish themselves in the business and social life of their respective communities. It is hoped that banks ultimately will meet most credit requirements for business and industry, but the hearings before our committee show conclusively that there is urgent need of supplementary and emergency credit for such business and industry. The amount appropriated for these loans is $300,000,000, and under the measure before us the amount of loans to any one borrower shall not exceed $100,000. I am inclined to believe that this amount should be increased. The authority to make these loans will end January 31, 1935, at which time the life of the Corporation expires. It is the hope of our committee that this $300,000,000 fund, which may be used as a revolving sum, together with the capital loans authorized in the bill to be made by the Federal Reserve banks from their combined surpluses, will be sufficient to care for the need for credits for capital funds supplementary to the usual or normal bank credits. Under the amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Act the loaning powers are temporary, whereas under the section amending the Federal Reserve Act the loaning powers are permanent.

Small industry has never had a permanent and dependable source of capital credit. It is not my opinion, however, that either or both of these provisions will be effective unless those in charge are willing to manifest faith in the recovery of this great Nation. To put this money where it will really do good and serve its primary purpose, appraisals of collateral and assets presented as security for loans must and should be reasonably liberal and be predicated upon normal and an orderly liquidation value. I do not understand, however, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the Federal Reserve banks should or will be required to go beyond a reasonable business risk, and for that reason there will be many disappointed applicants. All of us realize that there are many industrial and commercial businesses which are beyond rehabilitation. In many instances their present plight is by no means due to mismanagement or poor business judgment. Their case is one for extreme sympathy but not for assistance based on sound business judgment. Personally, without intending to reflect whatever upon the present management of the Federal Reserve banks, it will be an agreeable surprise to me if they really use the powers which they are given under this bill in a spirit of affording relief and thereby hastening recovery. I am confident, however, that under the present management of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the funds set apart for this purpose will be put to work in conformity with the purposes of this legislation.

There are a number of other important features of this bill designed to facilitate and safeguard obligations which the corporation has already undertaken. Section III is of considerable importance, in that it permits the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to extend the maturity of loans for a period of 5 years beyond January 1, 1935. Section X also provides for an important amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Act designed to aid in financing and facilitating exports and imports and the exchange of commodities between this and other nations. A full explanation of this section is included in the elaborate statement of the bill prepared by the officials of the corporation. I am incorporating herewith as a part of my remarks the latest detailed statement as to the operations of the corporation, which I feel will be of great interest to every Member of the House and to the country at large.

Since February 2, 1932, the date of its organization, the corporation has authorized disbursements for loans, purchases of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures, aggregating over $5,500,000,000. In addition, the Corporation has disbursed practically $800,000,000 for relief.

The $5,500,000,000 includes $788,000,000 loans to or for the account of closed banks for distribution to depositors, and approximately $1,100,000,000 for the purchase of preferred stock and capital notes and debentures in 6,994 banks.

Probably the most important and far-reaching function has been the rehabilitation of the capital structure of the Nation's banks, both State and National, through authorizing the purchase of preferred stock and capital notes and debentures. The investment of these funds has the twofold purpose of preventing further bank failures, thereby insuring bank deposits and enabling the banks to function in a normal way in the extension of credit. By helping the banks in this manner it has helped the depositors and borrowers. In its view a strong banking system, with every bank a sound bank, is essential to a sustained recovery.

Out of loans to 5,137 banks authorized, in the amount of $1,318,227,512.91, with actual disbursements of $1,113,478,667.93, all has been repaid except $310,606,571.36.

Loans actually disbursed for all purposes aggregate $3,189,198,230.87, upon which we have had repayments of $1,427,807,838.10, or approximately 45 percent.

It may be of interest to note that 34.9 percent of its loans went to banks; 16 percent for disbursement to depositors in closed banks; 3.6 percent to building-and-loan associations; 2.7 percent to insurance companies; 6.1 percent to Federal land banks; 0.3 percent to Federal intermediate credit banks; 0.5 percent to joint-stock land banks; 0.4 percent to livestock credit corporations; 6.4 percent to mortgage-loan companies other than those made in the reorganization of banks; 5.3 percent to regional agricultural credit corporations; 12.5 percent to railroads; 2.5 percent to self-liquidating projects; 0.4 percent for the sale of agricultural surpluses in foreign markets; 6.25 percent for loans on agricultural commodities, including corn, cotton, wheat, and so forth; and 2.2 percent for other loans.

You will be interested to know that of loans aggregating $434,000,000 to 1,362 banks that closed after receiving loans, $250,000,000 has been repaid.

The Corporation is required to furnish the Secretary of the Treasury with funds aggregating $325,000,000 to enable him to purchase the capital stock of home loan banks and the capital stock of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Of this amount, practically $200,000,000 has been paid to him.

The Corporation is required to furnish $200,000,000 to the Land Bank Commissioner to enable him to make direct loans to farmers and $100,000,000 to make loans to joint-stock land banks. All of the $200,000,000 has been disbursed and $2,600,000 of the $100,000,000.

The Corporation was required also to allocate $200,000,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture to enable him to make crop loans. Of this amount $115,000,000 net was paid to him. The sum of $44,500,000 was used to provide capital for regional agricultural credit corporations and $40,500,000 was reallocated to the governor of the Farm Credit Administration. All of these amounts have been disbursed.

The Corporation's loans of 10 cents a pound on cotton and 45 cents a bushel on corn, insured the people in the cotton States and in the great Corn Belt a living price for these products. These and other loans for marketing agricultural products, have aggregated $210,000,000 to date. Loans to regional and other agricultural credit corporations, aggregating $189,000,000 were also in the interest of agriculture and the livestock industry.

Of the $220,000,000 authorized for self-liquidating projects, $80,000,000 has been expended to date. The work is well under way, and disbursement should be practically completed within the next 18 months.

With few exceptions, the Corporation's loans to railroads are well secured and its loss from these loans should be very small. Its gold operations were without profit or loss, the Treasury taking over the gold it had accumulated at cost and interest.

The corporation has authorized $18,500,000 in loans to industry through community-mortgage companies, but the procedure is cumbersome and unsatisfactory, for which reason it has asked the power to lend directly to industry.

These figures reveal the magnitude of the great work done by this agency of the Government which in effectiveness has no parallel in the history of our Nation. I doubt whether any other governmental agency in the world during the same length of time has ever rendered a more prodigious service to its people. It has, of course, made mistakes, some of which none of us would ever condone; but, all in all, it is my judgment that it has rendered a high, noble, and wise character of service without which the wreckage and ruin that was prevalent among our key financial institutions could not have been halted short of utter destruction. Throughout the dark days of 1932 and up until the present hour a genius in finance has aided in guiding its destinies. He is today the chairman of the Board. Mr. Jesse Jones has perhaps rendered as great a public service as any other American during this crisis. He has demonstrated a courage rare in times like these. His judgment has been almost uncanny. Though fair always, he is ever firm. But for his strong physique and powerful mental acumen, his arduous duties would have long ago put him out of active service. Men of every walk of life have sought his counsel during this depression, and so far as I know he has always shown a sympathy and a desire to help. Under his guidance and direction, assisted by an able corps of aides who are performing their duties diligently and conscientiously, the Congress should have no cause for worry as to the disposition of the funds entrusted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Because life speeds along so indifferently and the roster of public servants changes so rapidly, I could not resist the temptation which this opportunity gave me of placing in the RECORD this deserving tribute to a great public servant. His unselfish devotion to and faithful execution of public responsibility have set a new high record of financial probity. Regardless of his power, his head stays on his broad shoulders and his big feet on the ground.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of S. 3487, having for its intent and purpose making of direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks. This, in my opinion, will be one of the greatest sources to be had in aiding national recovery. In almost every town of some several hundred inhabitants up, there are more or less factories and manufacturers of various kinds. They tend toward the decentralization of the people, and they give employment to people of the smaller communities who otherwise would have no source of a livelihood, and they increase the general wealth of the Nation.

These smaller factories and industries have in the past been able to go to their banks for working capital. Being of the smaller units, they have not been able to offer their stocks on the market and in the stock exchanges as large corporations can do, but have confined themselves for finances to their own local communities. Accordingly, they have not overexpanded, neither has their stock been sold beyond the physical value of their assets. They are substantial and sound, generally speaking, but their trouble has been that instead of their being permitted to keep and use money which they had secured legally, the resources of local banks have become so depleted that it was necessary for them to withdraw their loans. Accordingly, the local factory, which supplied work to the community and which maintained the wealth and prosperity of all of our smaller cities, has become paralyzed. Many are forced to close their doors, lay off their labor, which in turn causes still greater distress.

In my opinion, this act will be one of the greatest laws enacted toward relief for the country. These smaller industrialists are as a rule sound and conservative, they are operated by good business men, who have succeeded through hard work, close application to duty, and general good business methods. All they need is a reasonable amount of credit, which the Government is able to supply, and the security which the Government will receive in turn for the money loaned will be of the best, safest and soundest to be found anywhere. I am heartily in favor to the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI.]

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, in the 1 minute allotted to me, I want to emphasize the principle of direct credit involved in S. 3487, a bill relating to direct loans for industrial purposes. Opposition has been registered to this bill by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] on the ground that it is supporting the principle whereby direct credit may be extended by the Government to industry. The people are entitled to direct credit from their Government and will demand it in no unmistakable language ere long. That is the greatest argument in favor of this bill. It is the argument that we are going to have to face in a few years. It will be a case of not only extending credit to industry, but to every individual in the whole Nation.

The credit of this Nation belongs to the people as a whole and should be given to everyone. Up to this time, the privilege of extending credit has been reserved in a few, who have been giving out credit and charging interest on the privilege. It is high time that that privilege be taken over by the Government. It is high time that the Government should give this credit to all the people and charge only a service fee for the credit and not an interest rate or a tribute. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is about to speak. He always contributes greatly to legislation, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, when we gathered for this session, it became quickly apparent that there was no demand for help of more magnitude and more importance than that which we are confronting today.

A subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency was charged with considering about 70 bills for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was clear that the granting of all these requests would so strain the credit of the Government as to expose the country to the possibility of another great crisis. At every cost the credit of the Government must be maintained. There is a point, as I have said before in connection with these topics, when the last straw will break the camel's back. There is a point where the people once more will lose faith in the capacity of their Government to meet its obligations. Surely it behooves us always to bear that in mind and to face every request with the thought in the back of our heads that the granting of this request may be the last straw.

Under these circumstances, your committee, first through the vote of its subcommittee and then through the vote of its committee, with absolutely no element of partisanship, with no thought of any political or personal bearing, reached the conclusion that the measure now before you goes as far as a prudent man will dare to venture. I am saying this not because there appears the slightest doubt that you will not approve the report of your committee. The bill is sure to pass, perhaps unanimously; at any rate, with only one or two votes in opposition, I imagine.

The danger point is approaching. The danger point lies in the amendments that will be offered which will carry the strain on the Government beyond the point where 25 Members of this House are agreed we ought not to go. An open rule has been submitted which makes amendments possible. Each amendment offered will appeal to some Member of this House from local and personal consideration, and each amendment approved will be so much added to the loans. Therefore, I believe the greater part of our committee, if not every member of it, will hope that no amendment will receive the support of a majority of the House unless it has been approved by the committee.

Some of these amendments will raise a question that ought to be deeply dwelt upon by every Member, for they still further invade the duty and the responsibility of the States of the Union. One, in particular, relating to school districts, will in its benefits concern part of the States of the Union and not the rest. You will be asked to contribute the credit of the United States to the help of one of its largest States, in point of numbers and of wealth, one of the States that shares most largely in the income tax of the country, and one that ought to be able to pay its own way. Why should you gentlemen from smaller States, without the great wealth of Chicago and without the huge mass of successful agricultural population within the borders of that State, be asked to lend your money because the Legislature of Illinois will not face its responsibilities?

So with some of the other requests that will be made. I would dwell particularly on one which will be made of you by one of our Members from California, who comes to you with the request that the credit of New York, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Illinois, Minnesota shall be lent to that State of all the Union which boasts the most about its properity and its wealth, the State of California. Why should Arkansas or Mississippi or Florida or any other of the States with fewer millionaires come to the aid of the banner State of the Golden West, the State that boasts justly of its leadership in prosperity, of the size of its resources, the amount of its capital, the number of its wealthy people, yet comes here to ask these smaller States to lend their credit to help the city of Los Angeles buy out a private power company?

Ah, there, Mr. Chairman, you would embark upon a program that far transcends anything suggested by the words of the amendment. Men came before our subcommittee and told us that there were hundreds, aye, thousands, of municipalities that wanted to borrow money from the United States Government to buy out the private power companies. Suppose it to be a laudable end, granting, for the sake of argument, that it is a wise thing for these communities to add to their debts and add to their taxes and add to their burdens by buying out private companies. Grant you that for the minute, but why should I, a citizen of Massachusetts, be asked to help Los Angeles, 3,000 miles away, to buy out a private power company?

These are types of the amendments that will be laid before you. Men, ambitious, properly so, to represent the wishes and desires of their own constituencies, will urge you to join in giving to each one of them some share of what they seem to think is a boundless volume of credit.

So much for the appeal I would make in behalf of a committee that has tried to weigh the merits of all these questions, that has studied all aspects of them, that has taken into account not only individual benefit, but common burden. I ask you for that committee to support its views and accept its recommendations without other change than the committee itself may endorse.

Turning now to one feature of the bill which has not received much attention, I would have you act with your eyes open in this matter by pointing out that in this bill we make a start toward a new financial set-up in this country, a start that I for one am glad to see made. I should have preferred it to have taken some other form, but accepting this as the only practicable thing at the moment, I would have you appreciate what it is. Up to our own day banking in this country was largely confined to the commercial field. The prime purpose of a bank was to take the money entrusted to its care by depositors and put it at the service of commerce in the shape of short-time loans, 30, 60, or 90 days, rarely longer.

But within our time there has been added to the original conception of banking another conception to the effect that a bank should take the money of depositors and lend it for long-time use in the shape of continuing capital. Unregulated, unrestrained, this addition to the banking and financing of the country brought us to a position where we were confronted by the fears of the people, resulting in withdrawal of deposits, and the closing of thousands of banks that could not meet the demand. We found ourselves in a crash that hardly has been exceeded in any other great depression in the business history of the world.

Familiarly, we spoke of the cause as frozen assets. Frozen assets are long-time loans that cannot be quickly collected. Our banking troubles in the last few years have been due to a banking system with a large part of the money of the depositors tied up in long-time loans.

Seven years ago, I think it was, this Congress enacted a bill known as the "McFadden bill", which doubled the amount of money that banks could loan on real estate. I was in the minority as a member of the committee in that matter and spoke in vain protest against it on the floor of the House.

I do not want to use that most unpleasant phrase in the English language, "I told you so", but I cannot resist the temptation to say some of us fought that bill because we feared precisely the thing it produced. It contributed to the freezing of the bank resources of this country.

In addition to the loans on real estate, thus largely financed by the deposits of the people in humble walks of society, there came another addition to the banking system in the shape of definitely and openly joining investment banking to commercial banking by way of the affiliates that brought about another part of our trouble.

A year ago in the banking act, known as the Glass Act, we finally got rid of the affiliates. We finally drew the line between commercial banking and selling investment securities.

I want to take this opportunity to warn the House that unless in the legislation about to come before us in connection with another bill on top of the one we are now considering, we separate in that direction also investment and commercial banking, we will but prepare the way for another monetary crisis.

There is before your Committee on Banking and Currency a huge bill, a momentous bill—I almost said monstrous, but caught myself just in time—a bill relating to housing, which contemplates Federal sanction to putting the banking facilities of the country, the money of millions of depositors, at the command of those who seek funds for investment in building. I caution you that you may realize the path you are traveling. It may be we cannot now create a separate system to furnish long-time construction capital. It may be we have to tie it to our banking structure; but, if so, let it be under laws so clearly demarking the two fields of activity that we shall not invite the risks into which we plunged when 7 years ago we doubled the amount that the banks might lend upon real estate.

You may say that in this particular measure I am committing myself to a program which involves much of this. I do it because I hope this will be but a temporary step, and that through further study of the problem the Congress of the United States may secure those further changes which will result in the widest use of the capital of the country and at the same time the security of all its depositors.

I would point out to you that in the pending bill one half of the activities contemplated are to be only temporary. They are to be conducted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which we all hope will have a life of limited duration. In all probability in the next session we shall somewhat extend that life, but it was originally conceived and created to meet a temporary exigency. It was conceived and created by a Republican President. It has been continued and extended, and I believe wisely, by a Democratic President. I have no wish at this moment to claim party credit for such measures as the Republicans enacted when in the majority. Rather I would take the time to extend my felicitations to the Democratic majority in the House for having backed up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and for its present purpose to broaden the activities thereof.

The branch of progress contemplated here is found in making the Federal Reserve System a permanent agency for the supply of capital. Attention has been called, I think, to the fact that as the bill came from the Senate it was restricted to working capital. We have taken the responsibility of knocking out the word "working."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] has 2½ minutes remaining.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, my very able colleague from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], in explaining the rule this morning, indicated that he intended—and I understand he does so intend—to offer an amendment to section 5 (d), page 22 of this bill, to increase the aggregate amount of loans that may be made to any one borrower under such section to $300,000 or to $500,000. I urge the support of the committee and of the Members of the House for such an amendment. Three hundred million dollars is made available by this bill. That does not mean that the whole $300,000,000 will be loaned at any one time. If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to get out $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 between now and the 1st of January 1935, it will have to get it out much more speedily than it has been doing heretofore, provided, of course, it does not loan any more money to banks in Chicago.

This is for the purpose of continuing or increasing employment. The aggregate amount of $100,000 which hamstrings the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may include, I think, by fair construction, the existing obligations and the refinancing of the borrower. I submit that it is within their discretion. This is merely permissive. It is for the purpose of continuing or increasing employment. I know personally of industries not only in my district, but in my State and in neighboring States, which are perfectly solvent and which can comply with all of the requirements and to which a loan of $100,000 would be far from sufficient to enable them to continue or to increase employment.

In fact, the limitation of $100,000 placed upon the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is absurdly small. I was a member of the subcommittee which, under the leadership of another very able colleague of mine from the State of New York [Mr. PRALL], held extensive hearings on many proposed amendments to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

We had before us as witnesses in support of these proposed amendments men from many different callings and walks of life. The hardy fishermen from New England's rockbound shores appeared before us in support of a proposition to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to the fishing industry. The able and witty chairman of our subcommittee [Mr. PRALL] aptly commented upon their rugged and weatherbeaten countenances and complimented these men upon their ability as fishermen and admiringly commented upon the fact that, despite the many hours of arduous labor and hardship and danger which the pursuit of their calling entailed, most of them were fathers of large families.

We also had before us many teachers and representatives of school systems who were asking for aid through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the schools.

Our subcommittee decided in favor of the fishermen but against furnishing aid to the schools.

I may confess to you that, as a member of the committee, I voted against the proposition to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to furnish aid to the schools.

Knowing the desperate condition of some of the States in the South and Southwest and realizing the fact that in many instances the school year was shortened and thousands of teachers left unpaid, I have been somewhat troubled in my conscience since I voted with the majority of the committee against placing this authorization in this bill. The scales of my judgment at that time were almost evenly balanced. On the one hand was my desire to help the school teachers and to see to it that the boys and girls in these sections should not be denied the benefits of a public-school education; on the other hand was the consideration that education is primarily a function of the State and of the local district rather than of the Federal Government, and that I did not wish to do anything to blunt the keen edge of the spirit of our people in each of our communities and our States or lessen their sense of responsibility for the maintenance of a free public-school system.

While my judgment was thus in suspense I fell under the influence of the very able and eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and by his arguments was persuaded to vote against the authorization of aid to the schools. It is not at all strange, therefore, that in the welter of all the propositions which we, as members of this subcommittee, had before us, this little hundred-thousand-dollar restriction escaped our attention. I have felt guilty about the matter of the schools, but I lay it to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. I do not know whether that—the matter of schools—can now be corrected, but I do hope to see this bill finally framed so that it will effectually carry out the main purpose for which it was intended—the continuance of employment and the increase of employment; and for that reason I earnestly urge upon the committee the amendment which will shortly be offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] to increase the aggregate amount of the loans to any one borrower from $100,000 to $500,000. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the substitute under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

That (a) section 882 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 28, sec. 661) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 882. (a) Copies of any books, records, papers, or other documents in any of the executive departments, or of any corporation all of the stock of which is beneficially owned by the United States, either directly or indirectly, shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof, when duly authenticated under the seal of such department or corporation, respectively.

"(b) Books or records of account in whatever form, and minutes (or portions thereof) of proceedings, of any such executive department or corporation, or copies of such books, records, or minutes authenticated under the seal of such department or corporation, shall be admissible as evidence of any act, transaction, occurrence, or event as a memorandum of which such books, records, or minutes were kept or made.

"(c) The seal of any such executive department or corporation shall be judicially noticed."

(b) Section 4 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (N.S.C., supp. VII, title 15, sec. 604), is amended by inserting immediately before the semicolon following the words "corporate seal" a comma and the words "which shall be judicially noticed."

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first subsection on page 12 be amended to insert the letter "d" within the parentheses instead of the letter "b." Obviously that is a misprint.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 43, sec. 403), is amended as follows:

(1) By striking from the first sentence thereof "$50,000,000 to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts", and inserting in lieu thereof "$125,000,000 to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts, mutual nonprofit companies and incorporated water users' associations."

(2) By striking from the second sentence thereof "district or political subdivision" and inserting in lieu thereof "district, political subdivision, company, or association."

(3) By amending clause (4) thereof to read as follows:

"(4) the borrower shall agree, insofar as it may lawfully do so, that so long as any part of such loan shall remain unpaid the borrower will in each year apply to the repayment of such loan or to the purchase or redemption of the obligations issued to evidence such loan, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by it exceed (a) the cost of operation and maintenance of the project, (b) the debt charges on its outstanding obligations, and (c) provision for such reasonable reserves as may be approved by the Corporation; and".

(4) By adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"When any loan is authorized pursuant to the provisions of this section and it shall then or thereafter appear that repairs and necessary extensions or improvements to the project of such district, political subdivision, company, or association are necessary or desirable for the proper functioning of its project or for the further assurance of its ability to repay such loan, and if it shall also appear that such repairs and necessary extensions or improvements are not designed to bring new lands into production, the Corporation, within the limitation as to total amount provided in this section, may make an additional loan or loans to such district, political subdivision, company, or association for such purpose or purposes. When application therefor shall have been made by any such district, political subdivision, company, or association any loan authorized by this section may be made either to such district, political subdivision, company, or association or to the holders or representatives of the holders of their existing indebtedness, and such loans may be made upon promissory notes collateraled by the obligations of such district, political subdivision, company, or association or through the purchase of securities issued or to be issued by such district, political subdivision, company, or association."

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DISNEY: Page 18, line 7, after the word "association", insert a new paragraph (6), as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans, for periods not exceeding 20 years, to finance the acquisition of any system, plant, or works for the production, transmission, or distribution of electric energy by such public corporations, bodies, or instrumentalities as are referred to in section 201 (a) (1) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, which enter into contracts with the United States or any department, agency, or instrumentality thereof for the purchase of electric energy or for the use of any property, rights, or facilities employed in the production, transmission, or distribution of electric energy. No loan shall be made except with the approval of the department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States with which such contract is entered into. The provisions of title II of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended, and of acts supplementary thereto, applicable to loans to such public corporations, bodies, or instrumentalities, so far as consistent with the terms hereof, shall apply to loans made under the terms of this section."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It strikes me that it is not germane to this section and has no place in this section. This is a proposition for refinancing existing drainage and irrigation districts. The amendment is foreign matter to the purpose of the section, which amends section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933. It would be germane as a new section, but not as a new paragraph of section 6.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is germane, and I think the Parliamentarian will agree with me. It is not only germane to the bill but it is germane to this section, and right and proper, and should be adopted.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am not going to discuss the policy on the merits of the amendment. I confine my point of order to the question of taking this money which is supposed to be used to finance drainage and irrigation districts and using it for other purposes. The amendment is not germane to the pending section 6.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it does not take one dime from these projects.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCREYNOLDS). The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is in order, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is what was known in the Senate last week as the "Johnson amendment", which was defeated by a tie vote on first consideration and later lost by a very narrow margin. It simply provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make loans to municipalities for the purchase of existing plants or transmission lines, involving the use and transmission of electric energy, where, and only where, the Government or instrumentality of the Government is furnishing the electric power. It provides further that no such loan shall be made unless the instrumentality of the Government shall approve the loan, and it has other safeguards around it involved in the original act. For instance, with the Boulder Dam in the West and the Tennessee Valley Authority in Tennessee, before such a loan could be made, the T.V.A., the instrumentality of the Government, would have to approve the loan. That is all that is involved in the amendment. It is simply the making of loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of the acquisition of power plants or transmission lines in order to supply electrical energy to the people that is now being produced or furnished by instrumentalities of the Government, described as the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Boulder Dam authority.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I hope the Members of the House will not open this bill to amendments that may bring a veto or that may defeat the purposes of this bill. In the first place, this is the first day and the first occasion we have had an opportunity to make a contribution, a substantial contribution, to the recovery of this country. I ask you now not to allow this bill to become emasculated by amending in this or in any other fashion.

This question came up before our subcommittee. We heard the gentleman from Los Angeles, and, after all, this is especially for that one project.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. Not just at present.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman ought not make that statement, then.

Mr. PRALL. Well, the testimony shows that the gentleman from Los Angeles appeared before our committe. The city had purchased a plant covering a certain portion of the city and wanted to purchase another plant to cover the balance of the city in order that municipal power and light might be furnished. We have no objection to that, but it seems to me that some other method might be pursued in order to get the money for purposes of that kind. There is nothing to show that in buying existing electrical power plants there will be any added employment given. The proponents said the plant would have to be rebuilt, and that would bring about the employment of unemployed men; but we do not know that that is so. I ask the Membership to permit this bill to go through and to become a law as it is now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

First, I want to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] and say to him that this is not in the interest of Los Angeles, Calif., any more than it is in the interest of every other town, city, and municipality within the distribution radius of one of these public projects.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] says he does not want amendments, because it might provoke a veto. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I have talked with the President about this matter, and he is not opposed to this amendment in its present form. [Applause.] If the gentleman has any doubt about it, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, the majority leader, was with me at the time I talked with the President, and will verify what I have said.

The gentleman from New York would lead the House to believe that the only ones who came before the committee in favor of this amendment were from California. I appeared before the committee and argued in favor of this amendment, not because of my home town, because the people in my town had the wisdom years ago to hold title to their power plant and distribution system. This is not in the interest of my home town, but it is in the interest of other towns, cities, and municipalities. We appeared before the committee and argued this, not from a selfish standpoint, but from the broad standpoint of a national policy that we are now establishing in order to bring justice to the users of electric energy in this country.

Now, let us see what it means. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] has no objection to loaning money to industry, but whenever it comes to loaning money to a struggling municipality in order to enable it to acquire its own distribution system the gentleman says he is opposed to it and does not want any amendments at all to the bill.

Now, let us see what this does. We people who are fighting to bring justice to the users of electric lights and power in this country are not trying to destroy the property of anyone else. The gentleman from New York outlined, in the instance he gave from Los Angeles, Calif., a typical example. If those people are unable to buy that private plant, but should build in competition with it, the private plant will be destroyed and those owning interests in it will lose their investment. In the area covered by the Tennessee Valley Authority are many towns and cities which are trying to acquire their utility plants in order that they may purchase power from Muscle Shoals and relay it to their citizens at the yardstick rate laid down by the Tennessee Valley Authority; but in a great many cases where private interests own the power plant and distribution system, if the community builds in competition with the private interests, the private interests ultimately will be destroyed, after a long, drawn-out fight of competition, and those who own interests in the private plant will get nothing. As a result they are in a deadlock in many places in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and in Kentucky. The same thing will occur throughout the rest of the country.

Now, if you permit municipalities to borrow money with which to buy local plants and distribution systems, they can pay what the plants and the distribution systems are worth; and, at the same time, those who invested their money will get what the property is worth. It is the one loan that will be made under this bill that I would be willing to underwrite as being 100 percent self-liquidating. Every one of these plants will pay out.

Oh, the gentleman says, it will not help industry. Let us see whether it will or not. In my home town of Tupelo, Miss., there is a small cotton mill. I gave you these figures the other day. In January, when this cotton mill had to buy its power from a private concern, it paid $3,131 for the power used that month. In March, under the T.V.A. yardstick rates as laid down in the Tupelo contract, they paid $1,896, and used 26 percent more power than they did in January. The power used in March at the January rate would have cost them $2,112 more. In other words, this cotton mill saved $2,112 in 1 month on its power bill alone.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What contribution would this make to the employment situation of the country, assuming this money was spent by municipalities in buying power plants?

Mr. RANKIN. It is to be used in buying plants and distribution systems.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What will that contribute toward the relief of unemployment?

Mr. RANKIN. I am trying to show the gentleman that the amount of money saved by the decreased power rate will be employed by manufacturers in putting men back to work and paying them wages. As a result, instead of tramping the streets, those people will be at work. That is what has happened in the case of this cotton mill at Tupelo of which I have spoken; and the same thing will happen in similar cases all over the country. In the areas of these public plants there are factories today closed down or running half time—some have not run for months—because they cannot make buckle and tongue meet on account of the enormous charges that they have been paying for power.

Now, we shall not oppose this bill if you will give these municipalities this right to borrow money with which to buy these public plants and distribution systems. You say that it will not relieve conditions. Let me repeat to the gentleman from New York what I said on the floor not long ago when I gave figures showing that one man in Tupelo had his light bill reduced from $6.98 in January to $1.72 in March; another man had his light bill reduced from $2.30 in January to 75 cents in March; another one from $10.77 to $3.25. Does not this help people? Does not this help the man who is working for a living? It is more help to the laboring man than it is to the man who is able to buy luxuries. For this reason we people in the Tennessee Valley area, the people in the Boulder Dam area, the people in the Columbia River area, if you please, where these great projects are being constructed, are asking you to give us this opportunity to borrow under this bill, to secure loans with which to buy these distribution systems in order that we may go forward in this great movement to bring down light and power rates and at the same time not destroy the property of private individuals.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Why not give all the people of the country the right to borrow money from the United States?

Mr. RANKIN. It was thought that would be too far-reaching at the present time.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman wants this $300,000,000 diverted to the direct use of these particular communities and taken away from industry scattered all over the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. No; and if there is a man on earth who ought to vote for this amendment it is a man who comes from the State of Minnesota where they pay about the highest power rates in the country. We are not asking that you provide all this money for this purpose; we are simply asking that a very small portion of it may be used for this purpose.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for me to reply to the gentleman's statement?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. This would not reduce our power rates in Minnesota one cent, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, the gentleman from Minnesota does not seem to realize that in the fight we have waged for the last 5 years we have reduced utility rates in this country by $118,000,000; he does not realize that every time power rates in the Tennessee Valley area are reduced, or that every time power rates are reduced in the Boulder Dam area it redounds to the benefit of the people in every section of the country. No; that is the old Power Trust argument I have heard ever since I have been a Member of the House: That you merely help a few people in a little area around Muscle Shoals. That was the argument they used against the Muscle Shoals project, the argument they used against the Columbia River project and against the Quaddy project in Maine; it is the argument they used against all these public projects. I will admit that to help a manufacturer in Minnesota will not help the people of Mississippi, but I do not object because the bill contains provisions which will grant relief to the manufacturers of Minnesota; nor do I object to the bill because it will help the manufacturers in New York, provided we are given the same treatment and enabled to secure loans with which to buy our local distribution systems, in order that we may get cheap power and pass the benefits on to the people, thus giving them the benefit the Government has provided in the construction of these great public projects.

I sincerely hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to consume the 5 minutes or to speak on the merits of the amendment, but I call the attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma, the author of the amendment, to this situation. We are considering now section 6. There are four paragraphs under section 6 of this bill. All of these paragraphs have to do with amendments to section 36 of the Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 providing for refinancing existing irrigation and drainage districts. The pending amendment is to insert paragraph 5 dealing with an entirely different matter at the conclusion of paragraph 4. These four paragraphs deal with the question of refinancing irrigation and drainage districts. I suggest to the gentleman it would be better to offer his amendment as a new section; and if he does not object, I should like to amend his amendment by striking out of his amendment the words "paragraph 5" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "section 6."

Mr. RANKIN. We will accept the amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "paragraph 5" and insert in lieu thereof "section 6", where they occur in the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. There is a section 6 already.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That can be changed later on by amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in oppositon to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that I cannot find myself in accord with my colleague on the committee and my friend the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, who has presented this amendment so ably.

It seems to me if we admit that only a small amount of the funds provided in this measure are to be diverted to the purposes contemplated by the amendment, that we are involved in the admission that the amendment would benefit only a very limited number of municipalities of the country, giving them an advantage over sister municipalities throughout the land. If that be true, it seems to me the amendment can hardly be justified.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

It seems to me that if we are to embark upon this field of relief, if we are to depart from the theory of this bill and enter upon a policy of relief for all distressed municipalities throughout the United States, a measure of such vast importance should be taken up in its own right and receive the consideration which its importance demands and be passed upon with full recognition of what is involved. If we enter upon the policy of affording relief for all municipalities in the Nation, we should do so with some degree of deliberation, and with full knowledge of what is involved and of the burdens that will be entailed upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, if we adopt such a course, we shall be in position where we shall be required to substitute for the judgment of Congress the judgment of municipal governing authorities throughout the United States, subordinating whatever of judgment and of courage in this body that stand for protection of the National Treasury. Under such a program the National Treasury would be remanded to the tender mercies of those in control of the various municipalities throughout the land, who, by mismanagement and lack of prudence and foresight, have brought about conditions that have resulted in recent legislation practically authorizing municipalities to go into the bankruptcy courts to escape the burdens and obligations which taxpayers are no longer able to discharge.

I yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. May I say to the gentleman from Alabama that none of these loans may be made without being approved by a governmental agency.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes. I understand.

Mr. HOIDALE. What agency?

Mr. RANKIN. In this case it would be the T.V.A.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is all quite true. No loan under the bill can be made except with the approval of a governmental agency, but when we authorize it by implication we call upon the agencies of the Government to make these loans.

Where will it end if we are to continue to listen to appeals to open the doors of the Treasury to every institution and every distressed condition in the United States? I insist that there is no proper place in this bill for the pending amendment unless we desire to embark upon this policy as a national program. If we are going to do that, we should immediately strike out the $300,000,000 provided in this bill and substitute the figures $1,000,000,000 that will be required to accomplish such a purpose.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It is true that every dollar diverted for this purpose will be taken out of the amount of money available for industry in other districts?

Mr. STEAGALL. Unquestionably so.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PRALL, Mr. LEE of Missouri, and Mr. BROWN of Kentucky rose.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] was on his feet before the gentleman from New York attempted to shut off debate, and so was the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. PRALL. I shall amend the motion and make it 10 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many Members interested in this amendment and the gentleman should not try to shut off debate now. This is the most important amendment that will be offered to this bill.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for the State of Alabama. [Laughter.] I was conceived in that State. My father and my grandfathers on both sides are buried in that great State, and I want to speak especially for the people of Alabama and Mississippi.

Every county in the State of Alabama is bonded up to its full constitutional limits and so is every city in that State, and they have no money. They have no way of getting any money to get this power from Muscle Shoals unless you adopt this amendment. The same thing is true in Mississippi. They are already bonded up.

These loans for municipalities for this purpose would be the safest loans in the world, because they do not have to buy commercial politicians, they do not have to subsidize the press, they do not have to commit any fraud in order to furnish cheap light to the people of the country.

There is no light plant in my State that does not make money. Our labor was out of employment the winter before last, and in the city of Columbia, where our State university is located, they took $100,000 out of the light fund and put people to work building a sewer, and yet they have cheaper light bills where they have this municipal light plant than in any other city in Missouri that is served by a private corporation.

This amendment ought to be adopted. There is no reason why it should not be adopted, and all of you here who claim to be progressive, when you do go home, do not go around and tell your people, "Oh, I voted against it because I thought we could pass an additional bill." None of you believe we can pass an additional bill, and do not be using that as a subterfuge and as a fake on the people. Either be for this amendment or be against it; and then when you get home, if you have an opponent in the primary, let him tell the people how you voted, and I hope every one who votes against this amendment has an opponent because you ought not to be sent back here. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is a measure for the relief of distressed industries. It is a bill which it is hoped will immediately put food in the mouths of men who are not now at work, which will put clothes on their backs, which will let them mend the holes in their roofs—a relief measure.

It is now proposed to amend this bill by the equivalent of a subsidy that will allow a few municipalities to add to their tax rate, to add to the interest they must pay on securities, to add to the community burdens by buying out privately owned plants now running. The adoption of this amendment, in spite of what has been suggested, will, in my judgment, not meet the temporary needs of any community, not start a wheel turning, not keep a man on the pay roll, not feed a hungry person, not add to the confidence of any leader of our business or industrial life—and God knows that is what is most needed now, confidence—it will do nothing beyond benefiting a few regions of our country remote from each other; that is to say, in the Tennessee Valley, in southern California, and in Oregon or Washington, I forgot which. Just so much of the funds thus made available for purchases will be taken from the pay rolls of industrial workers the bill is designed to benefit. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, may I say in the beginning that if this amendment has no place in this bill it has no place in any bill. You cannot write a bill that this amendment would be satisfactory to those who are opposing this amendment.

If you want to do something for the people to whom the gentleman from Massachusetts referred, there has not been a bill proposed in this session that will do so much for them as this amendment. He says that it will only benefit the remote sections. If you do not live in New York or in Boston, you are in a remote section. When you benefit the people of the Tennessee Valley or the Columbia Valley or the great West, you are helping every other section of the country.

I am not speaking for my State; I am not speaking for Kentucky. It is our own fault, because in our State we are under the control of the Power Trust, and we will not get any relief; but I want some other parts of the country to get that relief.

If you will look over the history of the Tennessee Valley, you will see that all through the South they have lowered their rates because of the development in that valley. When you give these people a chance to buy their plants, you will put an element into the bill that will give the power companies a still further spur in reducing the rates.

This amendment was offered in the Senate and was defeated by a tie vote. If we put it in now, it will become a law. The chairman says that this will deduct from the amount of $300,000,000. That is to last only to January 31, 1935, and you will not much more than get the machinery set in motion before the time would expire. It will force them to get this money out quickly. Congress will be back in session next January; and if $300,000,000 is not enough money, you will be here, at least some of you will, to vote some more; and you ought to do it, if you want to take care of the people who need relief.

There is no leak in this country as big as the power leak. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], will cut down the leak that every man has to stand, if this amendment goes through, and in that way the consumer will be able to save some money, and he may use that money to mend his roof.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts referred to this as a subsidy. This is no subsidy. It will be a loan, every dollar of which will be paid back.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Yes; and it will have the best security back of it of any loan.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. In my county seat of Litchfield, for nearly 50 years we have had a municipal light, heat, and power company, and it has saved thousands and thousands of dollars to the consumers in that neighborhood, and I hope that all over this country we will have plants, larger or smaller, of that same kind. I am with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], on this amendment, and I am glad to be so. He is really the "Senator NORRIS" of this body, and I have fought together with NORRIS and I have fought alongside of LA FOLLETTE, and I am proud to fight now with him, and I am proud to fight with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN], and I hope that you gentlemen will not let the power trust dominate your vote. For God's sake, vote for the common people of this country.

Municipalities in Minnesota that have had the courage to break away from the privately owned companies and operate their own plants have been the cause of savings of millions of dollars in power rates to the patrons of these plants. Every municipally owned plant is a record of achievement of public ownership, and I know that the time will soon be here when the people will insist that the operation and use of power be placed directly in their hands.

Selfishness and greed, highjacking of our natural resources by the Power Trust, and a loss, if you please, of many millions of dollars out of the pockets of the users of electricity have been the result of private ownership. Investigations have proved that the Power Trusts have been nothing but a series of holding companies, investment corporations, trust companies, and the like, each draining a profit from the lowly consumer. It has been a long, hard fight to place liberal legislation into force, and the passage of this amendment means the advancement of municipal ownership of power throughout the Nation.

The people of this great country have suffered long enough from the domination of the Insulls, the Mellons, the Grundys, and the Vares. Let us throw off this yoke of special privilege. Let us place human interest above private capital. It is time for the people to assert their rights under the Constitution, and let us have measures that will return to them the great natural resources that are rightfully theirs.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. As I understand this amendment, it provides that loans shall be made to municipal plants that get their electrical energy from federally subsidized sources.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. BOILEAU. That applies primarily to the Tennessee Valley?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Yes; and to the west coast.

Mr. BOILEAU. How can the gentleman justify this amendment rather than an amendment that is broad enough to make such loans throughout the entire country?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. This is just one step in that same program, and you have to take this thing step by step. Every time you start doing anything for the common man in this country, they bring up the argument that this is not the place and this is not the way to write the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANKIN) there were—ayes 59, noes 97.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. (a) Sections 2 and 3 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes", approved June 10, 1933, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 15, secs. 605f and 605g), are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. In the event that any such insurance company shall be incorporated under the laws of any State which does not permit it to issue preferred stock, exempt from assessment or additional liability, or if such laws permit such issue of preferred stock only by unanimous consent of stockholders, or upon notice of more than 20 days, or if the insurance company is a mutual organization without capital stock, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized for the purposes of this act to purchase the legally issued capital notes of such insurance company, or, if the company is a mutual organization without capital stock, such other form or forms of indebtedness as the laws of the State under which such company is organized permit, or to make loans secured by such notes or such other form or forms of indebtedness as collateral, which may be subordinated in whole or in part to any degree to claims of other creditors.

"SEC. 3. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for or purchase any preferred stock or capital notes of any applicant insurance company, (1) until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it has unimpaired capital, or that it will furnish new capital which will be subordinate to the preferred stock or capital notes to be subscribed for or purchased by the Corporation, equal to the amount of said preferred stock or capital notes so subscribed for or purchased by the Corporation: Provided, That the Corporation may make loans upon said preferred stock or capital notes, or other form or forms of indebtedness permitted by the laws of the State under which said applicant is organized, if, in its opinion, such loans will be adequately secured by said stock or capital notes or other form or forms of indebtedness and/or such other forms of security as the Corporation may require, (2) if at the time of such subscription, purchase, or loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving total compensation in a sum in excess of $17,500 per annum from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates, and (3) unless at such time the insurance company agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation that while any part of the preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures (or, in the case of a mutual insurance company, other form or forms of indebtedness permitted by the laws of the State under which the company is organized) of such insurance company is held by the Corporation, the insurance company, except with the consent of the Corporation, will not (a) increase the compensation received by any of its officers, directors, or employees from the insurance company and/or any of its affiliates, and in no event increase any such compensation to an amount exceeding $17,500 per annum, or (b) retire any of its stock, notes, bonds, debentures, or other forms of indebtedness issued for capital purposes. For the purposes of this section, the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise for personal services."

(b) Section 11 of such act of June 10, 1933, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 15, sec. 605i), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "As used in this section and in sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act, the term 'State' means any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia."

RESTRICTING LARGE SALARIES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This section carries forward the policy of restricting the salaries of people who work for concerns obtaining loans from the R.F.C., that is, insurance-company officials, to $17,500 annually. In another section of this bill the policy is carried forward that has been adopted by the R.F.C. restricting salaries of executives of railroads to certain amounts. They are good policies and I hope they continue. I think it is time to call attention to the fact that something should be done about restricting the salaries of the Federal Reserve officials in the same way.

CONGRESS SHOULD PASS ON EXPENSES OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

The Congress of the United States should make an appropriation for the Federal Reserve banks. All profits of these institutions should be paid into the Treasury and all expenses allowed by Congress. As it is now, they have the use, the unlimited use, of the Nation's credit, free of charge. They take in the money and use it any way they want to. You do not know how they use it, you do not even know how much they pay in salaries, you do not know how much any one official receives, and I do not know if you could get the information if you requested it. An institution of that kind should be required to get an appropriation from Congress each year for operating expenses.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, will he gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

NO INDEPENDENT TREASURY

Mr. DISNEY. This would be an opportune time to call attention of the House to the fact that we have no independent Treasury of the United States. Every dime that comes in in taxes goes to the Federal Reserve System and not to the Treasury.

RESTRICT SALARIES TO $17,500

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution; he is exactly right. No one should object to an amendment to be written into this bill to restrict the salaries of the Federal Reserve officials to $17,500; some of them are now receiving $25,000, $40,000, and up to $50,000 a year.

FOUR TONS PAPER MONEY DAILY

Four tons of paper money leave the Bureau of Engraving and Printing every day, 500 bills to the pound. Most of that money goes to the Federal Reserve banks. They do not pay anything for the use of that money. They can issue two kinds of money, Federal Reserve bank notes and Federal Reserve notes. It did have outstanding about $200,000,000 in Federal Reserve bank notes, but on those notes they had to pay the insignificant sum of one half of 1 percent tax annually. They have to pay a tax of $5 a year on $1,000. On the Federal Reserve notes they do not have to pay a penny. They only pay 27 cents, the cost of printing $1,000 in paper money. Therefore, they complained about paying that one half of 1 percent tax, and they are actually taking out of circulation, retiring, those Federal Reserve bank notes and issuing in their place Federal Reserve notes, because it is too expensive—one half of 1 percent. They prefer to use the money that cost them 27 cents a thousand dollars.

BLANKET MORTGAGES

Any institution which has the right to give a blanket mortgage on your property and my property and the incomes of all the people of this Nation, certainly enjoys a great privilege. That is exactly what the Federal Reserve banks of this country do today. They have the exclusive right and privilege of issuing these blanket mortgages.

Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Bank Act provides that they shall pay an interest charge for the use of that money. When 4 tons of money leave here every day to go to the Federal Reserve banks, the law provides that they shall pay an interest charge for the use of the Government's credit, but the Federal Reserve Board set a rate of zero as the interest charge, and they do not pay one penny on earth. If they had paid what the law requires, we would not have a Treasury deficit. The amount would shock you.

POWER SHOULD BE TAKEN AWAY

Now, my friends, I think that great power should be taken away from them. They are in the Government's business. The issuance and distribution of money is a governmental function. I do not think that any corporation on earth that is owned exclusively by private corporations should have farmed out to them the great privilege of issuing money upon the credit of this Nation and getting the benefit of it themselves. The people should get the benefit of the use of their own credit.

I certainly hope no one will object later on when I make an effort to restrict the salaries to $17,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has expired.

The Clerk read down to and including line 5 on page 21.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 3487 and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEPOSIT-INSURANCE LEGISLATION

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged report (H.Res. 393, Rept. No. 1744) providing for consideration of the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes:

House Resolution 393

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3025, a bill to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes; and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider, without the intervention of any point of order, the substitute amendment recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

MOTHERS AND THE HOMES OF OUR REPUBLIC

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including an address delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] on Mothers and the Homes of the Republic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], from Station WOL in Washington over a national hook-up, on May 8, 1934.

When I listened to this eloquent and able address, I naturally thought of the charms and life of my mother and felt the speaker must have had in mind, as I did, the mothers of the Third Congressional District of Arkansas, and I concluded I would ask permission to have his remarks extended in the RECORD with a view of reaching the wonderful mothers of my district.

The address is as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the invisible radio audience, back of our Government, back of our religion and custom, is the home. The home is the foundation of all society. Upon it the superstructure of all civilization rests. The home is the institution where the father is the king, mother the queen, and the children are the subjects. In every home, whether it be in the large cities or upon the plains, valleys, farms, or mountain sides, there is a little sentiment upon the walls which inspires every man, woman, and child, which says: "God bless our home." What sweet, tender memories this sentiment always evokes in our heart and mind. Faith and hope should never depart from these humble firesides. The home is the cradle that nurtures our offspring. The home is the institution that shapes the destiny of our brood. As go the parents, so go the children; as go the children, so goes the home; as goes the home, so goes the nation and the world. Destroy the home, and you destroy society, civilization, and everything that goes with it.

Everyone is praying for happiness, for comfort, and prosperity to return to all who struggle for their daily bread, in order that their home may be maintained. We are hoping for a new day to break in upon all of us. Today the mortgages upon the homes of millions of our people are being foreclosed. Hunger, penury, want, and destitution stare these millions in the face. Today the homes of these unfortunate people are being threatened as never before. Economic conditions threaten to achieve what fire, flood, wind, and invasion have never done before. Property is gone, fortunes have been swept away, men and women beyond the middle age are back where they started, helpless and hopeless, not knowing where to turn for tomorrow's bread and shelter. And what is the cause of it all? It is the lack of money which is the lifeblood of our Nation.

Money symbolizes the crystalized efforts of labor and capital. Money represents the frozen labor of the past; the liquid flow of the present, and the solid reward of the future. Money preserves the home. It is transformed into the workers' daily bread. It puts food into our stomachs, coal in boilers, oil in motors, electricity in wires, and helps bring happiness and contentment in the home.

The angel of the home is the mother. She is the queen of our hearts, the inspiration of our souls, the ideal of our minds. Since God could not be everywhere, He created mothers to take His place. The old saying, "Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home", finds expression only when the home is presided over by the mother whom we adore and should always love, honor, and respect.

In my humble opinion, the greatest love in the world is mother love. A love that is dedicated and consecrated on the altar of hope and faith and baptized with tears. A love that shines sublime through pain, anguish, and suffering. A love that is not only willing to make the supreme sacrifice for the happiness and welfare of her brood but make the daily multiple, cumulative, little sacrifices, year after year, that in their aggregate make up a tremendous total. With the thought of sacrificial love there always comes the twin thought of the one who hallows our home, "mother." The Apostle John tells us that Jesus once said, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend." How many millions of mothers throughout the ages have laid down their lives on the altar of childbirth? How many mothers have ennobled humanity and the world in making the supreme sacrifice of their own lives that new lives might come into the world and carry the torch of civilization and justice into the homes, hearths, and firesides of suffering humanity the world over.

In all languages and in all climes the first intelligible sound uttered by an infant is the syllable or word that stands for "mother."

The care of the mother for her children does not end with infancy. It continues on through childhood, adolescence, young adult age, and maturity to the very day of her passing. The last thoughts of a good mother are always for her beloved children. During her life her children never grow up. The son who achieves a place of great distinction and power is never to her the distinguished leader of man; he is always her boy.

The daughter who marries well and attains a leading position in society or in the affairs of women, or who, best of all, herself becomes a mother, is still her darling girl.

Until the children become parents in due time, they are apt to chafe at some of the attentions of the mother; but when girls have gone through the same maternal experiences, they understand. Thus the attributes and virtues of motherhood are passed on from generation to generation.

Mothers, nowadays, are able to give better care to their children owing to the progress in health conservation. In the past 1 child out of every 3 succumbed to infantile disease. Today the ratio is 1 out of 7, due to the fact that modern mothers are enabled to apply and do apply scientific methods of child care, feeding, and rearing, of which their mothers knew little and their grandmothers still less. A soldier on the battlefields stands a greater chance of escaping death through shot and shell than a child does of surviving the perils to health that still menace infancy and childhood.

When the angel of death knocks upon the door and the celestial music summons and beckons us to the great beyond, the last thought in the mind of most of us is—mother.

Human beings learn by contrast. We cannot appreciate what is beautiful until we behold what is ugly. We do not appreciate the dawn and daylight until we have lived in darkness. We seldom realize our joys in life until they have passed away. Those who have living mothers cannot realize the utter lonesomeness of those who have lost their best friend, their mother. The death of a mother causes a great void, a great gap that never, never can be refilled. How often have I heard the anguished heart cries of children, of grown men, and women as they cry aloud for their departed mother, who has made the final pilgrimage to the great beyond, never to return.

I once wrote a poem which concluded by saying:

"When death does mother call away,
Oh, how we cry to have her stay.
Our wealth, indeed, we'd gladly spend,
If but to her we could attend.
Your duty do while she's alive,
To her alone justice must survive.
Success and honor will always be thine,
When to your mother while she's alive you'll be kind."

How many of my auditors in the great invisible radio audience realize the thousands of loving, sweet, tender acts that mother performs in her life, that her children and the father of her children may find peace, happiness, and contentment in their home? Loving acts about which she says nothing. Sacrifices, great and small, things that she goes without and denies to herself that her husband and her children may be well fed, well clothed, well groomed, and well cared for.

Every father provides the physical and material things that make a house; but it is the tender love, the sweet affection, the romance and sentiment of the mother that out of the things of the house she creates and makes a home.

Without homes we would be a nation of nomads, wanderers on the face of the earth, with no settled habitation nor permanent abode. Every act passed by Congress, no matter how apparently remote, in its final results affects the home. The act may deal with economics, finance, industry, agriculture, or commerce; but it becomes a good law or bad law according as it helps or harms.

The home must and shall be preserved; on its preservation depends the perpetuation of the Republic itself. We, Members of Congress of the United States, will do our duty to our Nation and its pople only when our first and last thought is, How will our work in Congress affect the home, and how will it affect and maintain the welfare, the happiness, and the contentment of the father, the mother, and the children of the home? God bless the homes of America. Be it ever so humble, God, help us to preserve the American home.

Next Sunday, May the 13th, is Mother's Day;
Remember your mother who has passed away,
Give to every living mother, every day,
The best you have in every way.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON SILVER

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the President's recommendation for silver legislation, coming as the result of numerous conferences with the advocates of silver in both branches of Congress, is a forward step in his plans announced last July, in which he said:

The United States seeks the kind of dollar which a generation hence will have the same purchasing power and debt-paying power as the dollar value we hope to attain in the near future.

In the words of his message, the proposed legislation is "a long step forward, but only a step." Congress has very definitely declared the policy of the Government upon this paramount of all issues in section 311 of the United States Code, "never repealed and still a law":

SEC. 311. Policy of United States as to bimetallism. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

When we consider that price level is the controlling factor in business and national prosperity and that history and statistics disclose the relation and control exercised by silver in price level, the importance of silver to industrial recovery and prosperity cannot be overestimated.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT OR DICTATORSHIP?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the principal issue before the country in the approaching congressional campaigns will be whether the Nation is to continue the constitutional government of our fathers or adopt the principles of fascism now dominant in Italy and Germany. In other words, is Congress by legislative action to continue to increase its delegation of powers to the Executive?

Anyone who runs may read that since the present administration began there has been a definite and partly successful drive to alter the American system. In the Agricultural Adjustment Act Congress delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture sweeping and unprecedented powers over the domain of agricultural production. In the "Recovery Act" Congress authorized the Executive to supervise and regulate the affairs of industry. I was present on the floor of the House when these measures were passed, and the leaders of the majority were vigorous in their assertions that the measures were simply to bridge over the existing emergency. It was stated by the sincere and able legislative leaders of the majority party that within a year we would be out of the wilderness and that these measures would then be discontinued. In fact, each bill recited in its preamble that the measure was for the emergency only. On the theory of the sailor that any port in a storm is a good one, these various relief measures were speedily passed. They were stop-gap in character and were intended only to bridge over the existing economic emergency. By these enactments Congress, at the request of the President, gave him powers as great as those enjoyed by Mussolini or Lenin. Representative government in fact abdicated on the theory that the measures in question would improve our condition and lead us out of the economic wilderness in which we were floundering. These measures were the genesis of the new deal, so called. They were prepared by the so-called "brain trust" whom the President called in to advise on the situation.

More than a year has passed since the enactment of these measures. The President and at least a portion of his party leadership in the House now say that the new deal must become permanent; that it is and shall be the function of the Federal Government to continue to regulate and regiment agriculture and perform similar functions in the field of industry. Whether or not that program should become the permanent American policy will be the issue in the approaching congressional campaign. It is my judgment this delegation of power over industry and agriculture which we have given to the Executive has failed of its destined purpose or at best has made all the headway possible. The welfare of America now demands that we return to the "roof trees" of our fathers.

In passing let me state that it is my judgment that the economic skies were brightening and improving at the close of the Hoover administration. Lacking, of course, in the personal magnetism possessed by the present occupant of the White House, it cannot be denied that no man in the history of America was abler or more accomplished than President Hoover in the field of national economics. He knew the mechanics of the depression, and it was his theory to ride out the storm by putting the Ship of State under reduced canvas and applying orthodox remedies to the situation.

I am one of those that believe that if he had been reelected, the situation would have been solved ere this. I believe that at the time of the Presidential election in 1932 he was bringing the Ship of State safely to port with no sacrifice of basic American principles. It is my belief that the continuation of the policy of the present administration means the aggravation and continuance of our present condition. In other words the experimentation, as President Roosevelt calls it, has failed. The business of ploughing under crops and slaughtering swine in the name of plenty for the farmer aids neither the man in the street or him who tills the soil.

The business of endeavoring to conduct industry by means of a sappy socialism and regimenting by rules prescribed by the "test tube" statesmen cannot be longer continued without permanent disaster to our economic life. The placing of the butcher and baker and candlestickmaker of the entire country under regimentation is impossible of orderly achievement in the interests of the whole people. Under the N.R.A. a man who charged 35 cents for pressing a suit of clothes was sent to jail for 30 days. This procedure, besides being typical of the whole performance, outdoes Hitler and Mussolini.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD GET OUT OF BUSINESS

It is my honest belief that the continued interference of Government with business, whether it be manufacturing or otherwise, can only result in prolonging the depression. Industry has had its opportunity for self-analysis and now understands the necessity of paying proper wages in order to keep up the national buying power. But it cannot do this if its status remains in the hands of the "brain trusters" and in the application of their pipe-dreams to industry. Continuance of this procedure, in my honest judgment, will be fatal to recovery. It is my belief that the loaning of money to solvent industry will do more good to cure unemployment in the country than any other method of relief. These loans should be thoroughly safeguarded, and every cent so advanced should be fully repaid within 5 years. If the Government will do that and then leave business to its own devices, the genius and pluck of the industrialists will do the rest. However, if business is hectored, lectured, and handicapped by the vaporings of the "brain trust" and the various "men on horseback", the situation will continue to be one of uncertainty and of nonprogress.

Assuming that experience and training in practical affairs are a necessary preliminary to doing business, the average "brain truster" could not operate a "hot-dog stand" successfully. Yet these modest gentlemen now say that all industry which employs less than 400 hands is inefficient. If the President and the majority in Congress go along with them on this theory, which they have done so far, it means that 50 percent of the community life in America will be wiped out. According to the Darrow report just made public, it would seem as if the destruction of small industry was already in part accomplished through the operation of the N.R.A.

REPUBLICAN CONGRESS NECESSARY

The only thing that can save America from a continuance of this outrageous infliction is the election of a Republican Congress. This will give business and industry the assurance that in the future they will be free from the callow interference of the "brain trusters." Although giving lip service to the Constitution, they are for the most part asserting the profit motive should have no place in our scheme of things.

The election of a Republican Congress would result in the return to sanity, a balanced Budget, and would take the present shackles off industry. Then the country would go full steam ahead.

THE A.A.A.

Its present policy of food destruction, which is without parallel in the history of the world, is typical of the handling of the farm situation by the present agricultural administration. Inconceivable as it may seem, the various sections of the A.A.A. are under control of or at least dominated by Tugwellian, Bean, and Mordeci types of "brain trusters", who have no knowledge of the business of agriculture and seek to apply book theory to its stricken condition. The Farm Board was rated as a dismal failure, but it was in fact much more effective in operation and shows more results than the A.A.A.'s performances. Top hogs are now selling for $3, despite the fact that 6,000,000 pigs and 600,000 sows have been destroyed at the cost of millions of dollars. Across the line in Canada, without any such artificial regulations, top hogs are selling for $8, despite the limited market which the smaller population of Canada presents. Twenty percent of the corn land has been reduced to idleness, and much of the last year's corn crop is still under Government seal. The corn farmers are therefore without relief. Cotton alone has fared better, for the sole reason that every phase of manufacturing that is even remotely a substitute for cotton is paying a processing tax into the Treasury for its benefit. Incidentally the eastern farmer and in some instances the western farmer are themselves paying the processing tax.

The experimentation of the A.A.A. with wheat has not been more successful.

DAIRYING

Perhaps the blackest chapter of the A.A.A.'s performances is in the dairying field. Over a year has passed since the enactment of this law, and the condition of the dairymen under the Agricultural Adjustment Act has been, in fact, further aggravated and depressed. The distinguished Secretary of Agriculture started out with the theory that the dairymen were in better condition than the wheat, corn, and cotton farmer. He and his cohorts in the dairying field, in obedience to the Secretary's complex that farm relief has no place except in the midwestern country where the agricultural group is and has been for a long time most vocal, actually attempted to depress the price of fluid milk in the various eastern and southern milksheds. The basis of this was the theory that by depressing the price of fluid milk, which the "brain trust" considered too high, they could bring up the price of butter. This depression of the price of fluid milk was done regardless of transportation costs, the feeding problem, and labor conditions in the various milk sheds. The A.A.A.'s whole administration of this problem has been characterized by fumbling and uncertainty. The effect of their policies has been to play into the hands of the distributors and the chain stores, whose profits during this period of depression have continued to increase.

It is my definite conclusion that if the dairymen of the country, and more particularly my own district and State, wish to avoid disaster, they keep away from the A.A.A. and all its works and pomps. It is my judgment that their economic salvation will be conserved by a return of the Republican Party to power and the re-creation of the buying power of the Nation through the usual and normal channels.

DEMOCRATS ARE DIVIDED

And we find notable dissenters from the policies of the A.A.A. and the N.R.A. who are members of the President's own party. Senator CARTER GLASS, one of the most distinguished and outstanding Members of the Senate, who was offered the portfolio of Secretary of the Treasury by the President, refused to put his two newspapers under the N.R.A., and I am advised characterized the Blue Eagle as the red eagle. I have the greatest respect for Senator GLASS. No man in my day has shown greater courage. He is an expert diagnostician of ballyhoo and "blah" from whatever source it comes. He is typical of the best that is in American life, and his protest is notable and worthy of careful consideration.

The happy warrior, former Gov. Alfred E. Smith, makes a no less vigorous criticism of the procedure that is being followed. He criticizes in unmeasured terms the unjustified and obvious permanent invasion of business by governmental spies and investigators. He regards with distrust the impractical and extraordinary invasion of private affairs by the "brain trust", so called. He has no confidence in the procedure or in the results. It is his view that this procedure means the passing of free government. It is his belief that it means the breaking-down of the rugged individualism, which is the finest thing in our American heritage.

BILLIONS FOR THEORIES

As I view it, our present situation is one of acknowledged experimentation. The administration's policies are coming not from the intelligence or experience of statesmen but from the test tubes of the college professors who constitute the "brain trust." The Budget is balanced solely by keeping two sets of books and billions have been contracted for in indebtedness to be paid for by future generations. Cotton is being plowed under while Government loans are being made to produce more crops so it can be plowed under in the future. A specific appropriation of $25,000,000 is made to finance a back-to-the-farm movement, which will make more agricultural overproduction. Eighty-six million dollars in new expenditures on new irrigation projects has been authorized, which will add 1,600,000 acres to that already under cultivation. Millions of pounds of fresh meat and canned meat are brought in from South America while 6,000,000 pigs are being slaughtered to reduce the meat supply. The "test tube" statesmen tell industry that they must manufacture at a largely increased cost but must sell and continue to sell the finished product at a loss.

The report is that National Chairman Farley has instructed the Secretary of the Federal Radio Commission to see to it that all radio stations in the country are available for use to put out the Democratic Party propaganda. Hitler or Mussolini have nothing on us in this year of our Lord.

It is my definite belief that this whole procedure and this continuation of delegated authority will be ruinous, not only to the farmer but to the industrialist.

The people of the country must take a hand. The return of the Republican Party to power in 1936 is the only remedy available. The relief of the people of all classes from the oppressive procedure of the present administration, its interference with private rights, its destruction of personal initiative, will be the issue in the congressional campaign of 1934.

WANTS MORE POWER

Although loaded with power, the "brain trusters" are reaching out for more. They wrote into the Stock Exchange Act a provision that gives them a blood clutch on small industry. The President himself is now seeking, and the Democratic House has voted, the power for him to make tariff treaties without Senate ratification. Secretary Wallace in his pamphlet, America Must Choose, urges the elimination of the tax on edible oils, sugar, flax, and wool. The House should remember that none of these items are in the surplus-production group, but the Secretary of Agriculture has declared them all uneconomic and has signed their prospective death warrant when his Chief obtains the right to negotiate tariffs without Congress' having any voice in the matter. I stand with Senator BORAH on this proposition when he says:

> I have no patience with those who are timid and apologetic about the Constitution. It is a living document formed in an atmosphere of emergency to deal with national emergencies. * * * Personal liberty is the keystone of our heart. There is a niche in history beside Washington and Lincoln for the brave man of today who has the courage to defend constitutional government against those who would destroy it.

The administration is greedy for power. Its attempt to control the tariff-making power, which under the Constitution belongs to Congress, is typical of the "brain trusters'" insurgency against the existing order.

The cancelation of the air-mail contracts and the resulting death of 10 Army aviators who were thrown into the breach to save the day are typical of the arbitrary performances which characterize the present administration. The American people should not be fooled. Hand in hand with the magnetism of the present occupant of the White House, Postmaster General and National Chairman Farley is utilizing the emergency to build up a vast army of Democratic officeholders. This new group includes an army of grain inspectors, cotton-crop inspectors, peanut-crop inspectors, and hog inspectors. They have no qualifications for the posts they occupy except that they march under the banner of Farley. Billions of dollars are being poured out of the Treasury for their sustenance. How this money will continue to be paid God alone knows.

In this situation I insist and repeat that the salvation of the country is dependent upon the return of the Republican Party to power. Thinking citizens of all parties are now turning to the Republican Party as the natural source for public action.

PARTY MUST BE PROGRESSIVE

In this day and generation the Republican Party must not hark back to the traditional Republican conservatism and standpattism. Nor should it don the scarlet coat of the ultraliberals. There is a safe middle ground between the two extremes, and there should be no political juggling for the purpose of getting into power. What is needed is a forward-looking leadership which has for its principles those of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt. The party should not be permitted to go back into the hands of the Tories, but it should be responsive to the trend of the times, which course is thoroughly consistent with adherence to constitutional government.

THE PEOPLE MUST CHOOSE

I have endeavored to outline the definite issues that confront the people in the congressional campaign of this year. The Republican Party will take its stand in that campaign for constitutional government and for the real advancement of labor and agriculture. I believe that the congressional elections of this year will definitely end the burden of experimentation which has been spendthrift and destructive of popular government. I believe that in the elections of this year we will return a Republican Congress which will represent the true American tradition and give us a leadership free from isms and Russian theory. By that course, and that course alone, the American people will insure national recovery and the continuance of American institutions.

THE LATE HON. HARCOURT J. PRATT

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with sorrow and regret that I announce to this Congress the death of Hon. Harcourt J. Pratt, of Highland, Ulster County, N.Y., a Member of Congress from the Twenty-seventh District of New York from 1924 to 1932. He died as the result of an automobile accident which occurred yesterday.

Mr. Pratt was one of the outstanding men in his district—quiet, unassuming, and genial, and with every qualification of a real gentleman; a business man of the highest type. These qualities were recognized by his associates in that they chose him to act as supervisor of the town of Lloyd, N.Y., for three terms, then sent him to the State Assembly in Albany, N.Y., and finally to Congress, where he remained for four consecutive terms. To protect his health in 1932 he decided not to stand for reelection and I have had the honor to succeed him.

While in Congress he was a member of the Committee on Agriculture and a great favorite among his colleagues. Not only has his district suffered a great loss but the Government of the United States has lost a great legislator.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we of the majority join in the expressions just uttered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOODWIN] with reference to our deceased former colleague, Hon. Harcourt J. Pratt, of New York. I have never met a man in public life who enjoyed to a higher degree the esteem and confidence of his fellow men than did Harcourt J. Pratt.

The news of his tragic death was a great shock to the Members on this side of the aisle who served with him, and we all join in expressing our profound sorrow at his untimely passing away.

PRINTING OF HOUSE RULES AND MANUAL

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I send to the desk a privileged resolution (H.Res. 371; H.Rept. 1746) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 371

Resolved, That the Rules and Manual of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-fourth Congress be printed as a House document, and that 2,500 additional copies shall be printed and bound for the use of the House of Representatives, of which 700 copies shall be bound in leather with thumb index and delivered as may be directed by the Parliamentarian of the House for distribution to officers and Members of Congress.

With the following committee amendment:

On line 3, strike out the words "two thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "sixteen hundred."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk I be allowed to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object to this request, it is important that we get through with the bank bills tomorrow, absolutely imperative; and I shall have to object to other requests along this line.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

THE TREND OF ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL EVENTS

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under privilege to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a dissertation by Cliff Stratton, of the Washington bureau of the Topeka Capital.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall have to object.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withdraw his objection? I have not inserted a single thing in the RECORD this session.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes tomorrow immediately following the gentleman from Indiana; and I hope the majority leader will not object to this request, for I have not used 10 minutes of the time of the House this entire session. Had my request to insert this matter in the RECORD not been objected to, I would not ask for even this 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. It is with the utmost reluctance and the greatest regret that I am forced to object to these requests, but it is absolutely imperative, if the House is to do what the people want it to do, finish the important business and go home, that these bills be passed.

Mr. Speaker, let me say to my friend that after these bills are passed there will be ample time for my friend and any other Member to talk, but let us pass these bills and get them into conference. While the conferees are conferring there will be ample time for Members to address the House.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. That is all very nice, but it does not meet my needs. I ask the majority leader not to object to my using 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. The difficulty with the situation is that if the gentleman takes 10 minutes there will be 20 minutes of the day gone. The gentleman must realize that if these important bills are to be passed we must devote our entire time to them.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I would remind the majority leader that I have saved the House many times 10 minutes this session.

Mr. BYRNS. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would remind the majority leader that the gentleman from Kansas is the first Republican Member who has asked to address the House in several days.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Kansas; but most certainly I shall be forced to object to any other requests made from either side to address the House tomorrow.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not ask for even these 10 minutes if the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw his objection to my request to insert this matter in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I do not think it is fair to the House for Members in the closing days of the session, when we have important legislation pending, to submit requests to address the House upon subjects not involved in the legislation.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want the 10 minutes. I shall put the matter in the RECORD. The gentleman from North Carolina has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. BYRNS. I have stated to the gentleman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Indiana has been given 10 minutes, that I shall not object to his having the time; but I am going to object to any further requests from either side of the House to address the House tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas to insert in the RECORD the matter to which he referred?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following copy of a learned and courageous dissertation on the trend of economic and political events by Clif Stratton, of the Topeka Daily Capital's Washington Bureau:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 19.—While the victory of Senator Dave Reed over Gov. Gifford Pinchot in Tuesday's primary in Pennsylvania may not be as much of a victory for standpat Republicanism as was promptly claimed by Senator DANIEL M. HASTINGS, of Delaware, it is significant of the growing revolt against the new deal over the country.

In the first place, Senator DAVE REED is perhaps the outstanding, certainly the ablest, exponent of conservatism on the Republican side of the aisle in the United States Senate. Just as Senator CARTER GLASS probably is the ablest, and almost certainly the outstanding exponent of conservatism in the Democratic side of the aisle.

REED, of Pennsylvania, stands for high protection for industry against income taxes, for the sales tax, against Government regulation in almost any form, has opposed every piece of farm legislation, every piece of so-called "labor legislation", since he has been in Congress. And he always has had the courage of his convictions. There has been no yielding on the part of DAVE REED. So a REED victory in Pennsylvania is not merely a conservative victory, it is a standpat victory.

On the other hand, Gifford Pinchot, from the time of the Pinchot-Ballinger controversy under President Taft, has been nationally known, so to speak, as a liberal, to the point of being a radical.

So when REED defeated Pinchot decisively—even in rockribbed Pennsylvania—it was taken in political circles as decisive victory for conservatism in government.

And it got the "goat" of the Roosevelt Democrats, even though it was purely a Republican primary fight.

In fact, the Pennsylvania primary got the "goat" of Senator JOE ROBINSON and other Democratic leaders in the Senate so completely that they forgot to analyze the election returns and simply put up the defense that, of course, Pennsylvania is a natural old-line Republican State anyway.

It remained for G. Gould Lincoln, veteran political writer for the Washington Star, himself a conservative on a conservative newspaper—but also one of the fairest writers on one of the fairest newspapers in the United States—to point out that statistically the Roosevelt forces could have made a much better case for themselves if they had analyzed the figures instead of taking the Pinchot defeat as equivalent to a Roosevelt-new-deal defeat.

Lincoln points out—with quiet humor—that there was a Democratic primary held in Pennsylvania the same day, and—but let Lincoln himself explain it:

"Just how far the victory of Senator REED can be held a sure test of sentiment for and against the Roosevelt policies in Pennsylvania is another matter. From the claims of the Republican leaders it might be assumed that all the supporters of REED were opposed to Roosevelt policies and all the supporters of Pinchot were for those policies.

"If that were an exact statement of the case, then it would be necessary to add to the Pinchot vote the vote cast for Mr. Guffey, (Joseph F. Guffey, the Democratic nominee, and an ardent Roosevelt supporter) who certainly was more of an out-and-out Roosevelt new dealer in the campaign than was Governor Pinchot. Mr. Morris (defeated by Guffey for the Democratic nomination) also claimed to be a Roosevelt man and for the Roosevelt policies.

The combined vote of Pinchot and Guffey, from the available returns, was 737,268 votes. If the REED vote was added to the vote cast for Mr. Morris—and this may not be entirely fair, since

Mr. Morris claimed also to be a Roosevelt man—the total is 607,074. The difference between the Roosevelt vote and the anti-Roosevelt vote—using the argument of the Republican leaders themselves—is about 120,000 in favor of Roosevelt's new deal.

"It seems surprising that the Democratic leaders, instead of seeking to show that a Roosevelt victory was not to be expected in rockribbed Republican Pennsylvania, did not instantly claim a victory for the Roosevelt new deal.

It seems to this particular amateur political observer, however, that the important thing in national politics to the agricultural Mississippi-Missouri Valley, to the Southwest, and to the agricultural sections of the Far West, is not Roosevelt at all.

Unless there is some sort of a miracle, Franklin D. Roosevelt will not be reelected President in 1936. It is not in the cards. No matter how far out of the depression the country has emerged by 1936, it will not have come far enough to be satisfactory. The voters will demand a different deal, whether another new deal or a square deal or just a change. Odds are that political control will shift from one side to another for the next three or four national elections. That has been history under somewhat similar circumstances.

So it seems here that the important thing to the agricultural States is not Roosevelt, the Democrat, and whether his policies—and they will prove to be many and varied between now and 1936—stands with the country.

Instead the important thing for Kansas and sister States is what group will dominate and what policies will prevail in the Republican ranks by 1936.

Factually it is a far cry from the republicanism of William McKinley, of Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., and even of William Howard Taft, to the republicanism of the era of Warren G. Harding, Calvin Coolidge, and Herbert Hoover. The word "era" of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover is used advisedly, or at least intentionally. For it was the New York Stock Exchange, financial interests, and high-tariff industrialists who dominated financial, business, and governmental policies during the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations.

Two of the things accomplished during the present administration probably will last, though in modified form, through several administrations to come, no matter what happens in the national-election years. Those two things are the change in control of the monetary system, including the banking system, and regulation of the stock exchange and issuance of securities. Neither was a politically partisan measure. Monetary change was forced and will continue to be forced by international trade conditions and by the break-down of the credit structure through misunderstanding of the functions of money and credit by financiers. And the stock exchanges have become too important to every business and every individual to be allowed to operate as they please, without regulation, again.

Roughly, that leaves planned economy—the N.R.A. and the A.A.A.—and the tariff, for political issues in the 1936 and to a large measure in the 1934 campaigns.

On the tariff issue the Republicans themselves very likely will have to make a choice between the policy of McKinley, as enunciated more recently, in part at least, by Ogden Mills in his Topeka speech last January, on the one hand, and the policy of such present-day spokesmen as Senator DAVE REED, of Pennsylvania, Senator DANIEL O. HASTINGS, of Delaware, Representative BERT SNELL, of New York, and what might be termed the New England-Pennsylvania industrialist group on the other hand.

Now the general industrial view is that the most desirable condition in industry consists of cheap manufacturing costs—low wages, machine efficiency, and cheap foodstuffs—plus high prices for manufactured products. That objective, from the short-range viewpoint at least, would be best attained by high protective industrial tariffs, low priced farm prices, and the price-fixing possibilities of the N.R.A.

In other words, if the Reed-Hastings-Snell, New England-Pennsylvania, combination has its way, the Republican Party in 1936 will stand for high protective tariffs on manufactured products, cheap foodstuffs, and price fixing for manufactured products.

The objective of the Agricultural Adjustment Act—its machinery may be effective or ineffective, experiment will determine that—but the objective is prices for farm products at least as high, relatively, as prevailed in 1910–14.

The objective of the N.R.A. is high wages and maintenance of prices.

In other words, the purely industrial group, if given control, would do away with the objective of the A.A.A. entirely, and would eliminate the high-wage objects of the N.R.A., but would retain that part of the N.R.A. which makes possible the maintenance of prices for finished products.

Hence, the importance to Kansas and the other agricultural States, in what groups and interests control the policies and candidates of the Republican Party in 1936. If the purely industrial group from northeast United States controls the Republican Party, that will be one thing. If the Republican Party is dominated—or even has a balanced power—that realizes the importance of balancing the national economy by having both high wages and farm prices high enough to give purchasing power to the agricultural sections, that is another thing.

It begins to look as if the Mississippi-Missouri Valley will be the real battle ground in the political battle which will determine the control and policies of the Republican Party.

If the great valley between the Appalachians and the Rocky Mountains can be weaned away from the efforts to raise farm incomes, the objectives of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and the fight to bring down tariff restrictions sufficiently to give this territory a fighting chance in the world markets, will go into the discard.

If the farmers do not want the A.A.A., the industrial section certainly will not try to retain the program. The industrial section wants cheap foodstuffs, no matter what the final price in lack of purchasing power might be. Also if the industrial group wins, the price fixing and monopolistic possibilities of the N.R.A. will be retained; the wage provisions will go into the discard.

Briefly stated, the foregoing are the reasons why it seems to one observer—and, of course, all this is largely a matter of opinion—that it is far more important to Kansas what groups and what interests are going to control the policies of the outs—the Republicans—in 1936, than how much we like President Roosevelt and the rather elusive new deal.

The political pendulum seems to have started its swing away from President Franklin D. Roosevelt. But it will be a sad day for Kansas if it swings as far as Senator DAVE REED, of Pennsylvania.

Just a personal word about Senator DAVE REED. This observer has a great admiration for his undoubted ability, for his courage, for his sense of loyalty to ideals—but his vision, and the vision of those who train with him, can never see beyond the western limits of the State of Pennsylvania.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES COMMEMORATING TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF DANIEL BOONE

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 18

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the President of the Senate in signing the enrolled bill (S. 3355) to authorize the coining of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, be rescinded, and that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized and directed to reenroll the bill with the following amendment:

Before the period at the end of section 1 insert a semicolon and the following: "but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models or master dies or other preparations for this coinage."

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW RELATIVE TO CITIZENSHIP AND NATURALIZATION

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 19

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the House of Representatives the enrolled bill (H.R. 3673) to amend the law relative to citizenship and naturalization, and for other purposes; that if and when the said bill is returned, the action of the Speaker of the House and of the President of the Senate in signing the said bill be deemed to be rescinded; and that the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reenroll the said bill with the following amendments, viz:

On page 2, line 1, of the House engrossed bill, strike out the following: "and unless the child, in" and insert in lieu thereof a period and the word "In".

On page 2, line 2, of said engrossed bill, after the word "alien" and the comma, insert the following: "the right of citizenship shall not descend unless the child".

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems that almost every bill that is passed by the House has to be called back for correction; I do not know how many there have been, but it seems like a waste of time. Every day we have one or two bills which, having passed both Houses of Congress and having been enrolled by the enrolling clerks, have to be called back and the work done over again. I believe it is a situation that deserves the attention of the leadership of the House.

The SPEAKER. In defense of the enrolling clerks, the Chair will state that this is but the third bill that has come back this session; and they have had more bills to enroll than they have ever before had at one session.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if this is anything but a clarifying amendment, if it involves any substantial change in the way the bill was passed.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. None at all.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from New York explain the effect of this amendment?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The bill is the so-called "woman's equality bill" that was passed by the House and unanimously passed by the Senate. It is now at the White House. The Attorney General has found certain clarifying amendments necessary. We discussed the clarifying amendments at the White House. The bill has got to go back tomorrow. It is most urgent that this bill be returned so that it may be enacted into law as passed by the House and the Senate 8 days ago, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Senate concurrent resolution will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Senate concurrent resolution just agreed to by the House I wish to state that I have been very active in connection with women's organizations interested in this particular piece of legislation, and I assure my colleagues that the changes are perfectly agreeable to them.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Fayetteville (Ark.) Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, there have been many petitions presented with reference to relief for persons suffering from "jake" paralysis. These petitions were signed by several thousand citizens. I have been requested to present the petitions for publication in the RECORD. I request that one petition be published and appropriately referred. All the other petitions are in the same language.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To His Excellency the Honorable FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.
To the Honorable PAT HARRISON and H. D. STEPHENS,
Senators from the State of Mississippi.
To the Honorable JOHN E. RANKIN, WALL DOXEY, W. M. WHITTINGTON, JEFF BUSBY, ROSS A. COLLINS, W. M. COLMER, AND RUSSELL ELLZEY, Congressmen from the State of Mississippi:

We, the undersigned citizens of Lauderdale County, Miss., being victims of peripheral neuritis, or "jake" paralysis, and the friends of said victims, hereby respectfully petition, request, and demand, as citizens of the United States, that you—

First. Cause an investigation to be made fixing and determining the responsibility of whatever governmental agency who, through failure, neglect of duty, or willfulness, permitted or caused the substance which caused said paralysis to be placed upon the market;

Second. Feeling that a governmental agency has fallen down, failed, neglected, and refused to function, and that as a result of such dereliction of duty numerous citizens of the United States have become invalids, cripples, and charges upon the State, counties, and municipalities, or upon their families, we respectfully request that you deal with us fairly, justly, and impartially; that you accord to the victims of this dreadful malady the same treatment that you yourselves would ask for, if you were the victims of neglect, the willfulness, or the wantonness that caused a large number of our citizens to become invalids as a result of said failure, neglect, or willfulness on the part of whatever governmental agency was responsible for said unfortunate occurrence;

Third. We respectfully ask, petition, and request that you use your influence to the end that Congress and the Government of the United States may, insofar as possible, right the wrong done to these unfortunates and place them again, as nearly as possible, in the position that they were before they became and are the victims of this neglect or willfulness;

Fourth. We feel, in asking that you do this, that we are only asking that which is right, which is fair, which is just, and, above all, which is equitable. We feel that these unfortunate victims have been denied the equal protection of the law, deprived of their constitutional rights, and are either the victims of a willful bunch of fanatics or of a grafting lot of exploiters who were willing to build their fortunes by rendering helpless a large percentage of the citizens of the United States, who have been deprived of their right to health and pursuit of happiness, and who have been rendered charges on either the State, counties, and municipalities, or their relatives; and

In conclusion, let us again adjure you that we do not seek alms or charity but that we simply ask justice and fair treatment at the hands of the Government, which each and every signer of this petition, if called upon, will gladly maintain, at the sacrifice of his own life.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That the act of April 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 259, 260; U.S.C., Supp. VII, title 39, secs. 464, 465c, 465d, and 465f), and the sections amended thereby are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. (a) Effective July 1, 1934, the rate of postage on air mail shall be 6 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof.

"(b) When used in this act—

"(1) The term 'air mail' means mail of any class prepaid at the rate of postage prescribed in subsection (a) of this section.

"(2) The term 'person' includes an individual, partnership, association, or corporation.

"(3) The term 'pilot' includes copilot.

"SEC. 3. (a) The Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail by airplane between such points as he may designate, and for initial periods of not exceeding one year, to the lowest responsible bidders tendering sufficient guaranty for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement at fixed rates per airplane-mile: Provided, That where the Postmaster General holds that a low bidder is not responsible or qualified under this act, such bidder shall have the right to appeal to the Comptroller General, who shall speedily determine the issue, and his decision shall be final: Provided further, That the base rate of pay which may be bid and accepted in awarding such contracts shall in no case exceed 33⅓ cents per airplane-mile for transporting a mail load not exceeding 300 pounds. Payment for transportation shall be at the base rate fixed in the contract for the first 300 pounds of mail or fraction thereof plus one tenth of such base rate for each additional 100 pounds of mail or fraction thereof, computed at the end of each calendar month on the basis of the average mail load carried per mile over the route during such month, except that in no case shall payment exceed 40 cents per airplane-mile.

"(b) No contract or interest therein shall be sold, assigned, or transferred by the person to whom such contract is awarded, to any other person without the approval of the Postmaster General; and upon any such transfer without such approval, the original contract, as well as such transfer, shall at the option of the Postmaster General become null and void.

"(c) If, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the public interest requires it, he may grant an extension of any route, for a distance not in excess of 100 miles, and only one such extension shall be granted to any one person, and the rate of pay for such extension shall not be in excess of the contract rate on that route.

"(d) The Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and shall include at least four transcontinental routes and the eastern and western coastal routes among primary routes. The character of the designation of such routes shall be published in the advertisements for bids, which bids may be asked for in whole or in part of such routes.

"(e) If on any route only one bid is received, or if the bids received appear to the Postmaster General to be excessive, he shall either reject them or submit the same to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its direction in the premises before awarding the contract.

"(f) The Postmaster General shall not award contracts for air-mail routes or extend such routes in excess of an aggregate of 29,000 miles, and shall not establish schedules for air-mail transportation on such routes and extensions in excess of an annual aggregate of 40,000,000 airplane-miles.

"(g) Authority is hereby conferred upon the Postmaster General to provide and pay for the carriage of mail by air in conformity with the terms of any contract let by him prior to the passage of this act, or which may be let pursuant to a call for competitive bids therefor issued prior to the passage of this act, and to extend any such contract for an additional period or periods not exceeding 9 months in the aggregate, at a rate of compensation not exceeding that established by this act nor that provided for in the original contract: Provided, That no such contract may be so extended unless the contractor shall agree in writing to comply with all the provisions of this act during the extended period of the contract.

"SEC. 4. The Postmaster General shall cause advertisements of air-mail routes to be conspicuously posted at each such post office that is a terminus of the route named in such advertisement, for at least 20 days, and a notice thereof shall be published at least once a week for 2 consecutive weeks in some daily newspaper of general circulation published in the cities that are the termini for the route before the time of the opening of bids.

"SEC. 5. After the bids are opened, the Postmaster General may grant to a successful bidder a period of not more than 30 days from the date of award of the contract to take the steps necessary to qualify for mail services under the terms of this act: Provided, That, at the time of the award, the successful bidder executes an adequate bond with sufficient surety guaranteeing and assuring that, within such period, said bidder will fully qualify under the act faithfully to execute and to carry out the terms of the contract: Provided further, That, if there is a failure so to qualify, the amount designated in the bond will be forfeited and paid to the United States of America.

"SEC. 6. (a) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed, after notice and hearing, to fix and determine by order, as soon as practicable and from time to time, the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of air mail by airplane and the service connected therewith over each air-mail route, but not in excess of the rates provided for in this act, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space, or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rates of compensation, and to publish the same, which shall continue in force until changed by the said Commission after due notice and hearing.

"(b) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed, at least once in every calendar year from the date of letting of any contract, to review the rates of compensation being paid to the holder of such contract, in order to be assured that no unreasonable profit is resulting or accruing therefrom. In determining what may constitute an unreasonable profit, the said Commission shall take into consideration all forms of gross income derived from the operation of airplanes over the route affected.

"(c) Any contract which may hereafter be let or extended pursuant to the provisions of this act, and which has been satisfactorily performed by the contractor during its initial or extended period, shall thereafter be continued in effect for an indefinite period, subject to any reduction in the rate of payment therefor, and such additional conditions and terms, as the said Commission may prescribe, which shall be consistent with the requirements of this act; but any contract so continued in effect may be terminated by the said Commission upon 60 days' notice, upon such hearing and notice thereof to interested parties as the Commission may determine to be reasonable; and may also be terminated by the contractor at its option upon 60 days' notice. On the termination of any air-mail contract, in accordance with any of the provisions of this act, the Postmaster General may let a new contract for air-mail service over the route affected, as authorized in this act.

"(d) All provisions of section 5 of the act of July 28, 1916 (39 Stat. 412; U.S.C., title 39, secs. 523 to 568, inclusive), relating to the administrative methods and procedure for the adjustment of rates for carriage of mail by railroads shall be applicable to the ascertainment of rates for the transportation of air mail by airplane under this act so far as consistent with the provisions of this act. For the purposes of this section the said Commission shall also have the same powers as the Postmaster General is authorized to exercise under section 10 of this act with respect to the keeping, examination, and auditing of books, records, and accounts of air-mail contractors, and it is authorized to employ special agents or examiners to conduct such examination or audit, who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"(e) In fixing and determining the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for air-mail transportation, the Commission shall give consideration to the amount of air mail so carried, the facilities supplied by the carrier, and its revenue and profits from all sources, and from a consideration of these and other material elements, shall fix and establish rates for each route which, in connection with the rates fixed by it for all other routes, shall be designed to keep the aggregate cost of the transportation of air mail on and after July 1, 1938, within the limits of the anticipated postal revenue therefrom.

"SEC. 7. (a) After December 31, 1934, it shall be unlawful for any person holding an air-mail contract to buy, acquire, hold, own, or control, directly or indirectly, any shares of stock or other interest in any other partnership, association, or corporation engaged directly or indirectly in any phase of the aviation industry, whether so engaged through air transportation of passengers, express, or mail, through the holding of an air-mail contract, or through the manufacture or sale of airplanes, airplane parts, or other materials or accessories generally used in air transportation, and regardless of whether such buying, acquisition, holding, ownership, or control is done directly, or is accomplished indirectly, through an agent, subsidiary, associate, affiliate, or by any other device whatsoever: Provided, That the prohibitions herein contained shall not extend to interests in landing fields, hangars, or other ground facilities necessarily incidental to the performance of the transportation service of such air-mail contractor, nor to shares of stock in corporations whose principal business is the maintenance or operation of such landing fields, hangars, or other ground facilities.

"(b) After December 31, 1934, it shall be unlawful (1) for any partnership, association, or corporation, the principal business of which, in purpose or in fact, is the holding of stock in other corporations, or (2) for any partnership, association, or corporation engaged directly or indirectly in any phase of the aviation industry, as specified in subsection (a) of this section, to buy, acquire, hold, own, or control, directly or indirectly, either as specified in such subsection (a) or otherwise, any shares of stock or other interests in any other partnership, association, or corporation which holds an air-mail contract.

"(c) No person shall be qualified to enter upon the performance of an air-mail contract, or thereafter to hold an air-mail contract, if at or after the time specified for the commencement of mail transportation under such contract, such person is (or, if a partnership, association, or corporation, has and retains a member, officer, or director that is) a member, officer, director, or stockholder in any other partnership, association, or corporation, whose principal business, in purpose or in fact, is the holding of stock in other corporations, or which is engaged in any phase of the aviation industry, as specified in subsection (a) of this section.

"(d) No person shall be qualified to enter upon the performance of, or thereafter to hold an air-mail contract, (1) if at or after the time specified for the commencement of mail transportation under such contract, such person is (or, if a partnership, association, or corporation, has a member, officer, or director, or an employee performing general managerial duties, that is) an individual who has theretofore entered into any unlawful combination to prevent the making of any bids for carrying the mails: Provided, That whenever required by the Postmaster General the bidder shall submit an affidavit executed by the bidder, or by such of its officers, directors, or general managerial employees as the Postmaster General may designate, sworn to before an officer authorized and empowered to administer oaths, stating in such affidavit that the affiant has not entered nor proposed to enter into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mails, nor made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person to bid or not to bid for any mail contract, or (2) if it pays any officer, director, or regular employee compensation in any form, whether as salary, bonus, commission, or otherwise, at a rate exceeding $17,500 per year for full time.

"SEC. 8. Any company alleging to hold a claim against the Government on account of any air-mail contract that may have heretofore been annulled, may prosecute such claim as it may have against the United States for the cancelation of such contract in the Court of Claims of the United States, provided that such suit be brought within 1 year from the date of the passage of this act; and any person not ineligible under the terms of this act who qualifies under the other requirements of this act, shall be eligible to contract for carrying air mail, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3950 of the Revised Statutes (act of June 8, 1872).

"SEC. 9. Each person desiring to bid on an air-mail contract shall be required to furnish in its bid a list of all the stockholders holding more than 5 percent of its entire capital stock, and of its directors, and a statement covering the financial set-up, including a list of assets and liabilities; and in the case of a corporation, the original amount paid to such corporation for its stock, and whether paid in cash, and if not paid in cash, a statement for what such stock was issued. Such information and the financial responsibility of such bidder, as well as the bond offered, may be taken into consideration by the Postmaster General in determining the qualifications of the bidder.

"SEC. 10. All persons holding air-mail contracts shall be required to keep their books, records, and accounts under such regulations as may be promulgated by the Postmaster General, and he is hereby authorized to examine and audit the books, records, and accounts of such contractors and to require a full financial report under such regulations as he may prescribe.

"SEC. 11. Before the establishment and maintenance of an air-mail route the Postmaster General shall notify the Secretary of Commerce, who thereupon shall certify to the Postmaster General the character of equipment to be employed and maintained on each air-mail route. In making this determination the Secretary of Commerce, in his specifications furnished to the Postmaster General, shall determine only the speed, load capacity, and safety features and safety devices on airplanes to be used on the route, which said specifications shall be included in the advertisement for bids.

"SEC. 12. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to prescribe the maximum flying hours of pilots on air-mail lines, and safe operation methods on such lines, and is further authorized to approve agreements between air-mail operating companies and their pilots and mechanics for retirement benefits to such pilots and mechanics. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to prescribe all necessary regulations to carry out the provisions of this section and section 11 of this act.

"SEC. 13. It shall be a condition upon the awarding or extending and the holding of any air-mail contract that the rate of compensation and the working conditions and relations for all pilots, mechanics, and laborers employed by the holder of such contract shall conform to decisions of the National Labor Board. This section shall not be construed as restricting the right of collective bargaining on the part of any such employees.

"SEC. 14. The Federal Radio Commission shall give equal facilities in the allocation of radio frequencies in the aeronautical band to those airplanes carrying mail and/or passengers during the time the contract is in effect.

"SEC. 15. After October 1, 1934, no air-mail contractor shall hold more than three contracts for carrying air mail, and in case of the contractor of any primary route, no contract for any other primary route shall be awarded to or extended for such contractor. It shall be unlawful for air-mail contractors, competing in parallel routes, to merge or to enter into any agreement, express or implied, which may result in common control or ownership.

"SEC. 16. The Postmaster General may provide service to Canada within 150 miles of the international boundary line, over domestic routes which are now or may hereafter be established and may authorize the carrying of either foreign or domestic mail, or both, to and from any points on such routes and make payment for services over such routes out of the appropriation for the domestic Air Mail Service: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as repealing the authority given by the act of March 2, 1929 (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 465a).

"SEC. 17. The Postmaster General may cause any contract to be canceled for willful disregard of or willful failure by the contractor to comply with the terms of its contract or the provisions of law herein contained and for any conspiracy or acts designed to defraud the United States with respect to such contracts. This provision is cumulative to other remedies now provided by law.

"SEC. 18. Whoever shall enter into any combination, understanding, agreement, or arrangement to prevent the making of any bid for any contract under this act, to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract, or to deprive the United States Government in any way of the benefit of full and free competition in the awarding of any such contract, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

"SEC. 19. If any person shall willfully or knowingly violate any provision of this act, his contract, if one shall have been awarded to him, shall be forfeited, and such person shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than 5 years.

"SEC. 20. The President is hereby authorized to appoint a commission composed of five members to be appointed by him, not more than three members to be appointed from any one political party, for the purpose of making an immediate study and survey, and to report to Congress not later than February 1, 1935, its recommendations of a broad policy covering all phases of aviation and the relation of the United States thereto. Members appointed who are not already in the service of the United States shall receive compensation of not exceeding the rate of compensation of a Senator or Representative in Congress.

"SEC. 21. Such commission shall organize by electing one of its members as chairman, and it shall appoint a secretary whose salary shall not exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum. Said commission shall have the power to pay actual expenses of members of the commission in the performance of their duties, to employ counsel, experts, and clerks, to subpena witnesses, to require the production by witnesses of papers and documents pertaining to such matters as are within the jurisdiction of the commission, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and for such purpose there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $75,000."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the title proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "An act to revise air-mail laws, and to establish a commission to make a report to the Congress recommending an aviation policy."

And the House agree to the same.

BISHOP JAMES E. FREEMAN—SERMON BY BISHOP GAILOR

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a sermon by Bishop Thomas F. Gailor, of Memphis, Tenn., commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the ordination of the Right Reverend James E. Freeman, D.D., Bishop of Washington, Sunday afternoon, May 20, 1934.

Bishop Gailor is one of the greatest men in any church anywhere. He is one of the most eloquent men to whom I ever listened. He is beloved by all in Tennessee—loved for his outspoken stand on all subjects, for his good deeds, for his splendid character, and for all of those qualities which make a man truly great.

His tribute to Bishop Freeman, of Washington, is a high tribute, richly deserved.

I am asking on my own initiative and without the suggestion of anyone else and with the hope that every Senator at least will read every word of it, Mr. President, that this short address be printed in the RECORD. I guarantee that each one will be benefited by doing so.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"If a man seeketh the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work." (I Timothy iii: 1 (revised).)

The seven Greek words used in this sentence have a deeper meaning than that which appears in the literal statement of the text.

The free rendering and the true significance of this great saying of St. Paul is: "The man, who makes an offering of his life to the ministry of the church, sets his heart upon a noble and honorable occupation."

It is worth our while then today, at this anniversary service, to consider for a few moments: (1) What is the significance and value of the Christian ministry? and (2) What appeal does it make to the young men of our country in our time?

The characteristic obligation and privilege of this ministry, as it is described in the New Testament, may be summed up under three heads, viz: It is a witness; it is a stewardship; and it is a priesthood of service.

(1) It is a witness to the grace and truth that came into the world by our Lord Jesus Christ. By the example of the personal life and power of the spoken word, it is to bear testimony to the fact and blessing of the incarnation and to proclaim the message of God's redeeming love to the children of men.

It has no power to invent new truth, but only to bear witness to what was the truth which the church received from Christ.

It is, however, an authoritative witness and speaks for the church and has therefore authority to reprove, rebuke, exhort; to plead as an ambassador for Christ, possessing the word of reconciliation—to impose discipline and to absolve—to bind and to loose.

Brethren, this continuous and unbroken succession of official and authorized witnesses to Christ goes back to the 40 days after the Resurrection, when the great commission was given, "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me." It is the sure guarantee throughout the 18 centuries of Christian history of the unchangeable truth of the gospel—the spiritual and eternal sanctions of right conduct—"the faith once for all delivered to the saints." It is the rock foundation upon which we approach the study of the evidences of Christianity. Its appeal today is as clear and strong and as certain as it was when Paul spoke to the Athenians from Mars Hill, or when Polycarp bore his testimony at Smyrna, or when Chrysostom preached in Constantinople, or Ridley and Latimer stood at the stake at Oxford, or Hannington won his martyr's crown in the midst of darkest Africa.

Through the Christian ages the Christian ministry has borne its witness to the redemptive purpose of God—revealed in His Son, Jesus Christ; through many persecutions and unceasing trial and privation and self-denial, through discouragement and criticism, in the courts of kings and in the homes of the poor—at sick and dying beds and in the far-off wilderness, by precept, by faith and love and long-suffering—never free from human imperfection and the liability to human error, but all the same a witness which has not been equaled for its enthusiasm and consecration, for its simplicity and its beneficence, in the history of the world.

(2) This ministry is a stewardship. As the Apostle says in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, "We are stewards of the mysteries of God", or, again, in the same epistle, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel, for I have a stewardship intrusted to me."

Although our advancing knowledge and the changing order of the world may by the light of the Holy Spirit open our minds to new aspects of the truth and enrich the content of words and phrases that have come down to us from the past, yet there are exceeding great and precious promises intrusted to the Church, for the pure and faithful transmission of which the ministry is specially responsible. The ministerial succession, in due order and regularity, is itself a trust, with which is involved the preservation of the simplicity and purity of the revealed truth of the gospel, according to that injunction to Timothy, "Oh Timothy, guard that which is committed to thy trust", and "the things which thou hast heard of Me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (I Timothy vi : 20 and II Timothy ii : 2). This idea of stewardship is one of the deep and pregnant characterizations of the ministry in the New Testament. Our Lord, speaking to His chosen Apostles, says, "Who is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall set over his household, to give them their portion of food in due season?" "Blessed is that servant, whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." And St. Paul's declaration seems to be an echo of this, when he says (I Corinthians iv : 1), "Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful."

Here, then, my brethren, the ministry is spoken of as a trusteeship, and the church for 1,800 years has believed it to be a trusteeship of truth and order. This means that there is such a thing as definite truth revealed by God, which must be protected and handed on, and there is such a thing as an authorized and authoritative ministry to whom the care of it has been specially committed.

History tells us how the ministry of the church has discharged this trust. There have been times, no doubt, when ignorance and superstition seemed to get the upper hand, as when the tide of barbarism swept down on southern Europe and when for 7 centuries it seemed almost as if the truth would be entirely smothered by the invasion; but, as Guizot says, the ministry saved it. There were whole generations when the representatives of the ministry seemed to be steeped in bigotry, but the church was never entirely lacking in faithful stewards. And you and I would never be here today enjoying the privileges of liberty in a free church for free men were it not for that sense of stewardship which in the darkest hours of the Middle Ages inspired the hearts and minds of faithful bishops and faithful priests, who handed on through criticism and discouragement and self-sacrificing toil the everlasting truth of the everlasting gospel.

What a fine and noble and inspiring quality of manhood and womanhood that is, the quality of faithfulness to trust, of entire trustworthiness? There can be no higher tribute to a man than that you can trust him through and through and out and out.

There is a story of the Civil War which has thrilled our people in this money-making age and touched their deepest chords of sympathy. It is the story of a boy, not yet 20 years of age, who was captured within the Federal lines at Pulaski, Tenn., in possession of valuable information as to the fortifications and plans of the Union troops, which he had evidently been intrusted with by someone in the service of that army. He was offered the alternative of declaring the name of his informant or of dying an ignominous death. A free pardon was offered him if only he would disclose the secret. * * * On the scaffold he died, saying, "I would rather die a thousand deaths than betray my trust." And today, upon the hill of the capitol at Nashville, the noble statue of Sam Davis looks out over the busy city, with a look that seems to plead with our young men for the higher interpretation of life, "I have a trust, my manhood, my opportunities, my honor; I have a trust committed to me."

What clearer, higher message has the church for men than that?

To men of wealth she says, "God permits the differences in human life. Some have poverty, some have riches. Some are successful and some are unsuccessful. Let not the prosperous be proud nor the failures be despondent. With every gift of life there is a corresponding responsibility. Sooner or later the Lord of the vineyard will say to you, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward." Wealth and intellect, power, influence, and success, these are but trusts that are imposed upon us for which every man shall give account to God; and the solemn and heartfelt recognition of this law of the Almighty Judge would solve most of the social problems of our time.

Brethren, it is the glory and the burden of the Christian ministry that for 18 centuries it has represented to the slow-believing world this ideal of stewardship.

Times may change and we change with them, but today the stewardship of the ministry is as real and the trust as great as when Athanasius disregarded the flattery and the threats of emperors, and stood faithful, contra-mundum, against his world. And the command of the Master is as clear and ringing as it was to St. Paul, "It is required of stewards that a man be found faithful"—not brilliant nor popular nor successful, but faithful to his trust.

(3) For, thirdly, this ministry is priesthood. It carries on and represents to the world that great and sacred truth of the priesthood of Jesus Christ.

Let us think for a moment what this means. All human religion in all ages has expressed itself in priesthood. Man was created with the innate and instinctive desire for approach to God and union with God. Therefore, we find him always making offerings to God through appointed agents. The offerings we call sacrifice and the agents we call priests. Then our Lord came, perfect in His humanity, perfect in His divinity, and made the perfect sacrifice of obedience to God's will.

Even if man had never sinned there would have had to be some such perfect approach to God by perfect obedience, and it was the fact of sin that dyed the Christ's life with the purple tinge of pain.

Therefore, in the last day of His earthly life He instituted a ceremonial rite which should for all time declare and set forth the perfect union between man and God which He had accomplished by His complete obedience, and this rite he enjoined upon His disciples, saying, "This do in remembrance of Me."

The holy eucharist is the restoration of the primative idea of sacrifice. In it there is no element of that shuddering fear and shrinking dread, with which the heathen world brought its slain victims to propitiate the offended majesty of the All-Holy; but it is the sign and symbol of the confidence of man redeemed and restored in Christ, conscious of His sonship, and believing in the eternal love, which sooner or later shall seek and save all them that are lost.

No wonder that the holy communion, through more than 60 generations, has been and continues to be the central movement in the church's worship. No wonder that, in connection with this unique, tremendous, ceremonial action has grown up and developed the choicest creations of man's genius in music and architecture; the loftiest aspirations, the most passionate devotion—aspiration and devotion which have touched the tenderest chords of our hearts, even when accompanied by the most ignorant and unworthy superstition.

For this eucharist is essentially and intrinsically the declaration of God's love for man and of man's capacity for perfect love to God through Christ, the daily challenge to our indifference and the condemnation of our lack of love. It interprets the meaning and justifies the organization of the church. It summons every individual believer to a surrender of himself, soul and body, to cooperation in Christ's work for the redemption and salvation of mankind. It is the bond of union, the sacrament of brotherhood, the symbol and pledge of the ultimate victory of the kingdom of God.

And this priesthood of worship and love and service, which is the characteristic note of the whole church, as Saint Peter says, is emphatically the obligation and privilege of the church's authorized ministry. So St. Paul, in that sixteenth verse of the fifteenth chapter in his Letter to the Romans, uses words which put a twofold emphasis upon this fact. "I put you in mind", he says, "by the grace of God which was given me to make me a liturgical minister of Christ to the Gentiles, ministering as a priest the gospel of God in order that the sacrificial offering of the Gentiles might be acceptable to him."

Thus the Christian ministry is a priesthood of service to God and of service to man—representing the church in pleading before God the Christ-given memorial of that supreme love which redeemed humanity by entire obedience, and again representing the church in its organized ministration of blessing and help and sympathy to all mankind. As the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, "They watch for your souls, as they that must give account."

(4) This is the meaning and the purpose, and this is the appeal of the Christian ministry in our time. It offers no assured reward of worldly gain, of comfort, of luxury, of commercial profit, nor even of present power and success. It holds out only the prospect of unequaled opportunity of service and of encouragement of the spiritual life of our people; of having the mind and heart uplifted and satisfied by the consciousness of work that is done for God; of contributing something, however small, to the laying of that foundation of righteousness upon which the security and permanence of this Republic surely depend; and, finally, of hearing some day, when the struggle-storm of life is over and its fever past, from the lips of Christ our Lord: "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (St. Matthew xxv : 23).

My brethren, we are met here today to commemorate Bishop Freeman's 40 years of service in the Christian ministry; and we may say that in an honorable degree, in his life of unselfish devotion to duty he has exemplified that ideal of the priest and pastor, which has been and is the high tradition of our Anglo-Saxon church where, as the poet Wordsworth says:

"All generous feelings flourish and rejoice—
Forbearance, charity in deed and thought,
And resolution, competent to take
Out of the bosom of simplicity,
All that her holy customs recommend,
And the best ages of the world prescribe."

Bishop Freeman has been permitted, by the grace of God, to make a notable contribution to the realization of the ideal of Christian citizenship in our time. For 16 years rector of St. Andrew's Church, Yonkers, N.Y.; for 11 years in St. Mark's, Minneapolis; for 2 years in the Epiphany, Washington; and for 10 years bishop of this important diocese, nobly and effectively he has carried on the work of Bishop Satterlee and Bishop Harding in the building of this National Cathedral, and with zeal and conspicuous ability he has given his service to the Nation and the church.

What greater or truer ideal of American citizenship can we desire or have than this? What career of political leadership can surpass this in beneficent service to our country?

My brethren, it was Saul of Tarsus, the Hebrew of the Hebrews, the pupil of Gamaliel, who has told us, in the measured wording of our text, that "He who makes an offering of his life to the ministry of the church sets his heart upon a noble and honorable occupation." He knew what it was to forsake the great opportunities of secular life. He also knew the incapacity, or else the unwillingness, of many that were near and dear to him to understand the necessity under which a man, by the power of strong conviction, felt compelled to make a glad offering of his life for service rather than to achieve for himself a so-called "brilliant career" in the world. And, therefore, writing from his Roman prison to a young man like Timothy, appointed to be the first bishop of the church in the rich, the famous, the beautiful, the intensely worldly city of Ephesus, his words ring out with special meaning and emphasis: "He that giveth himself to the ministry hath set his heart upon an honorable occupation"; "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life"; "Be sober in all things, suffer hardship, do the work of an evangelist, fulfill thy ministry"—"For I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is come. I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the Righteous Judge, shall give me at that day, and not only to me but also to all them that have loved His appearing."

So naturally today our thoughts go back through the long centuries that have elapsed since these glorious words were written; and we rejoice that the historic witness has been so faithful, that the words seem to have been uttered only yesterday. For more than 1,800 years have passed since then, but the work of the evangelist, the service of the Christian ministry, the responsibility of the Christian bishop are more than ever, if possible, real and positive factors in our religious, our social, and our national life. Let us then surrender ourselves to the elevating and inspiring memories which this occasion excites and sustains, and in the commemoration of the 40 years of service of this well-beloved bishop, let us acknowledge our debt and pay our tribute to those 60 generations of the faithful servants and priests of God, to whose faith and loyalty we owe it that we are assembled here today.

FEDERAL ACTIVITIES AGAINST LAWLESSNESS—ADDRESS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL CUMMINGS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject: "How the Government Battles Organized Lawlessness", delivered by Hon. Homer Cummings, Attorney General of the United States, May 12, 1934.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW THE GOVERNMENT BATTLES ORGANIZED LAWLESSNESS

Ladies and gentlemen, in its campaign against crime the Department of Justice is primarily concerned, of course, with the enforcement of the Federal criminal statutes. Most criminal activities do not constitute violations of the laws of the United States, but are infractions of State statutes. The desperado Dillinger, for example, whose deeds of bloodshed and violence have recently terrorized the Middle West, has, so far as we are able to ascertain, committed only one Federal offense—the transportation of a stolen automobile from one State to another. The explanation for this lies in the fact that in our political system the Federal Government possesses only those powers which are granted to it, expressly or impliedly, by the Constitution. The Congress is, therefore, limited in the enactment of criminal statutes to those objects that are within the purview of the United States Government as defined in the Constitution.

A few of these laws are the Dyer Act, prohibiting the interstate transportation of stolen automobiles; the Mann Act, designed to curb the white-slave traffic; the so-called "Lindbergh kidnaping" statute, making it a Federal offense to transport a kidnaped person from one State to another; the antitrust laws; the extortion statute, which makes it a crime against the United States for a person to send through the mail an anonymous or unsigned communication threatening death, kidnaping, or personal injury for the purpose of extortion; the mail fraud statutes; and the statute which makes the theft of goods from interstate shipments a Federal offense.

The efforts of the Department of Justice to apprehend and punish those who violate these statutes are meeting with heartening success. During the fiscal year 1933, convictions were obtained in more than 95 percent of the cases in which persons were tried in the Federal courts for criminal offenses. A total of 3,896 convictions were obtained, and prison sentences were imposed which totaled 4,764 years, exclusive of probationary sentences totaling 2,659 years and suspended sentences of 1,149 years. The fines which were imposed aggregated $326,177.07. In addition, 1,163 Federal fugitives from justice were located.

Since the passage of the Federal kidnaping statute the Department has attempted, with the cooperation of State and local authorities, to bring to justice the participants in 27 kidnaping cases. In these 27 cases 56 convictions have been secured; 2 death sentences, 11 life sentences, and other prison sentences aggregating 924 years have been imposed; and 17 persons are now in custody awaiting trial.

Recently we presented to the present Congress a so-called "12-point" legislative program, consisting of bills which the Department was anxious to have enacted into law. This 12-point program deals with racketeering; transporting stolen property in interstate commerce; provisions strengthening the so-called "Lindbergh kidnaping statute"; fleeing from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution; burglarizing national banks; killing or assaulting a Federal officer while he is engaged in the performance of official duties; participation in a riot or escape at any Federal penal institution; the importation, manufacture, or sale of machine guns and concealable firearms; and matters of procedure and authority.

I am greatly pleased to report that practically all of these bills are in a fair way to become laws in the very near future.

In addition to the 12-point program, the Department of Justice is now suggesting to the Bureau of the Budget an appropriation for the purpose of permitting the Department to increase its force and modernize its equipment. This appropriation, if made by the Congress, will enable the Department to employ 270 additional investigators, and to purchase the following equipment: 20 armored automobiles, 200 fast cars, 110 two-way automobile radio sets, 70 monitor automatic rifles, and 70 submachine guns. Both the men and the equipment are urgently needed. At the present time the Division of Investigation has only 419 investigators for a country that covers more than three and one half million square miles and numbers more than 125,000,000 people.

The War Department has generously offered to the Department of Justice the use of Army planes in emergency situations.

The campaign upon which we have embarked includes, as a cardinal feature, a program of complete and friendly cooperation with the law enforcement agencies of the several States and municipalities. Moreover, the facilities of the Department of Justice are always at the disposal of these agencies.

Especially useful is the Identification Unit of the Department of Justice. This unit has on file more than 4,000,000 fingerprint records of criminals, representing the largest and most complete collection of its kind in the world, and is receiving each day additional criminal identification data from more than 6,400 contributors in the United States and foreign countries. These records are available, without cost, to law-enforcement officials throughout the country. Each inquiry addressed to the Identification Unit by any officer of the law is replied to within 36 hours after its receipt.

A uniform crime reporting system is also maintained for the collection, analysis, and dissemination of data concerning the volume, nature, and fluctuation of crime. The statistical section receives reports of crime conditions from the police departments of more than 1,600 cities and, after compiling these records, publishes the results in a quarterly bulletin entitled "Uniform Crime Reports." These bulletins are furnished to law-enforcement agencies in all parts of the country.

A technical laboratory has been established for research work. Here experiments are conducted with advanced scientific equipment, and the results of the tests are made available to all law-enforcement officials.

In a radio address several months ago, I stated that the Department of Justice was contemplating the organization of a national institute of criminology. Since that time further consideration has been given to the matter, and plans are now being made which look toward its establishment. The functions of the new organization will be: (a) To assemble, digest, and translate into practical form reports of improvements in the various branches of the administration of criminal justice, such as police, prosecution, court organization and administration, probation, parole, penocorrectional institutions and experiments, and the pardoning function; (b) to educate civic organizations in different parts of the country as to the nature of these materials, their availability, and how they may be used locally to improve the administration of criminal justice and to help in the prevention of delinquency and criminality; (c) to conduct a training school where specially qualified officers, Federal, State, and municipal, may study scientific methods of crime repression and prevention. A primary concern of the proposed new unit of the Department of Justice will be the development of methods for dealing effectively with young predelinquents and delinquents, thereby tending to check crime at the source.

The Department of Justice and the law-enforcement agencies of the several States must be supported by an informed public opinion if the efforts to repress and prevent crime are to succeed. Moreover, we must put an end to the day when public prosecutors and peace officers fraternize with known gangsters and killers; when jails and penitentiaries are like sieves from which the instructed criminal readily escapes; when a newsreel picture of a notorious desperado is applauded in a motion-picture theater; when a petition for the pardon of a vicious murderer, even before his capture, is circulated and signed by hundreds of citizens; when politicians ally themselves with kidnapers and extortioners and dispose of the "hot" money which these dastardly enemies of society obtain from their victims; and when physicians and lawyers lend aid and assistance to fugitives from justice. Moreover, it is imperative that we put an end to the maudlin glorification of the criminal. The gangster is not a romantic hero as he is too often depicted by the thoughtless or irresponsible. On the contrary, he is usually a coward at heart and always a public enemy. The path to a better ordered and safer society is beset by many difficulties, but with a long pull and a strong pull and a pull altogether, we shall not fail.

PROTECTION AGAINST DISCRIMINATORY AND EXTRATERRITORIAL TAXES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to lie on the table a statement by me as to the purpose of section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1934, to afford to American citizens and corporations trading abroad a certain protection against discriminations and extraterritorial taxes of any foreign country.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 103, REVENUE BILL OF 1934—RATES OF TAX ON CITIZENS AND CORPORATIONS OF CERTAIN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

1. Amendments to section 103, reported by the Senate Finance Committee: The purpose of section 103 is to afford to American citizens and corporations who are trading abroad a certain protection against discriminatory and extraterritorial taxes of any foreign country. The section provides that if the President finds that under the laws of any foreign country American citizens or corporations are being subjected to discriminatory or extraterritorial taxes, he shall so proclaim, and thereupon citizens and corporations of such foreign country shall be subject to an additional income tax, equal to the income tax otherwise imposed upon the citizens and corporations of that foreign country.

The bill as passed by the House of Representatives covered only discriminatory taxes and fixed the additional tax rate at 50 percent of the present tax. The Senate Finance Committee amendments extend the section to cover also extraterritorial taxes and increase the rates of additional tax to 100 percent of the present tax. Both of these amendments were approved, first, because it is necessary to complete the description of the character of such unjust taxes to which Americans may be subjected; and second, in order to make the additional tax sufficiently heavy to act as an efficient deterrent against such taxes.

2. Discussion of discriminatory and extraterritorial taxes: This section is a wise provision, supplementary to other measures now being adopted by our Government to promote our foreign trade. It is now realized that we cannot return to our former well-being unless we go beyond our own frontiers into foreign markets to sell the goods we cannot consume at home. Our predepression standard of living was dependent upon our trading in all parts of the world; our workmen on the farm and in the factory are not likely again to enjoy the high wages and benefits of the twenties unless their employers once more sell their products in the highly competitive and usually well-protected markets of the western world, South America, and the Orient.

The recapturing of foreign markets requires much more than loading goods on ships and the will to sell. As is well known, many countries now impose large or even prohibitive tariffs, and also limit, by means of a quota, the amount of goods that can be imported into their borders. Where a product can be imported into a foreign country despite the tariff and the quota, it encounters the internal taxes of the country. So long as these internal taxes are no greater than those paid by the local producer, the American importing goods into the foreign country has no cause for complaint, even though these taxes be heavy. However, when the American encounters a tax which, by its terms, lays a peculiar and onerous burden on him, not borne by others, he is placed in a position where it is always difficult and often impossible to do business. Such situations exist today, and it is these situations to which section 103 is directed.

The term "discriminatory taxes" is intended to mean those taxes of a foreign country which are so framed, imposed, and enforced as to result in a special tax burden upon American concerns, greater than those imposed on the enterprises of that country or of the most-favored nation. The term "extraterritorial taxes" is intended to mean those taxes which so flagrantly violate accepted rules and concepts of law with respect to the amount of income or other subject matter held to be properly within the taxing jurisdiction of the country as to amount to laying taxes beyond the territorial limitations of the country and upon income or property without its borders. An example of a discriminatory tax is one which operates to lay on American concerns higher taxes than that imposed on national enterprises of the taxing country, or on enterprises of a third country. An example of an extraterritorial tax would be a tax upon an American concern in respect of the income or property of any phase of its activities which is clearly beyond the proper taxing jurisdiction of the country imposing the tax.

FRENCH DIVIDEND TAXATION

France has a corporation income tax at the rate of 15 percent. In addition, there is another tax upon corporations at the rate of 16 percent upon the amounts of dividends and interest paid by that corporation. These taxes are payable alike by French corporations and foreign corporations doing business in France, and the American corporation that does business in France has no just cause for complaint against the payment of these taxes. However, in addition to this, the French taxing authorities are now endeavoring to collect a second dividend tax of 16 percent upon American corporations. Many American corporations have found it advisable to set up a French subsidiary to do business in France. This subsidiary pays the 15 percent income tax and also the 16 percent dividend tax on the dividends it declared to the American parent corporation. The French tax administration has asserted within the last few years a new construction of an old law of June 29, 1872. It apparently considers that the American parent corporation which has a French subsidiary is really doing business in France and that therefore it should pay the 16 percent dividend tax on a proportion of all dividends declared and paid by it in the United States to its American stockholders. It is fair to say that probably the best legal opinion in France among members of the French bar is that this is an incorrect interpretation of the law, but the fact remains that the authorities are endeavoring to collect such taxes. It has been estimated that the total of the amounts which French tax authorities are now endeavoring to collect from American corporations on this theory is in excess of 1,500,000,000 francs. Some of these assessments are being tested in the courts. The leading case is that of the Boston Blacking Co., which has been pending for several years in the Court of Cassation (the supreme court of France) but is still not finally decided.

This tax is discriminatory because it is not imposed on French companies with French subsidiaries. It is also very obviously an extraterritorial tax because it is laid upon dividends and interest paid in the United States by an American corporation to American shareholders and bondholders, and even without regard as to whether an equivalent amount of income was received from the French subsidiary. According to all generally accepted principles, such a levy is without the jurisdiction of France and invades the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

After the action of the French authorities was instituted, our Government made representations, and as a result thereof, a treaty was negotiated between France and the United States in 1930, was signed in April 1932, and was ratified by the United States Senate on June 15, 1932, without dissenting vote. The treaty has not yet been ratified by the French Parliament, in spite of any efforts on the part of the United States to obtain such ratification. This treaty provides, among other things, that if an American concern has a branch (which is not a subsidiary) in France, it will pay the 15-percent tax on the net profits of the branch and a 16-percent tax upon three quarters of that income, on the assumption that this will approximate the amount ordinarily declared out in dividends. If there is a French subsidiary, the dividend tax will be payable on the dividend actually paid by it, but no tax will be payable by the American parent corporation. These two provisions are permissive in that the American corporation may declare its desire to be taxed in accordance with those provisions. While I have spoken of this as a tax upon dividends, it also applies to interest paid by the corporation. If this treaty were ratified, the controversy with respect to this tax would be satisfactorily settled.

3. Other cases of discriminatory or extraterritorial taxes: There are other cases of discriminatory or extraterritorial taxes; but the question is a somewhat technical one, and it would take too much time to enter into a complicated discussion of this character, even if I were an expert qualified to discuss it from the technical point of view. I am not prepared to assert at the present time that there is or is not any tax other than the French tax to which I have referred, which should properly be now held to be of this character, but I am inclined to believe that there is no other situation at the present moment sufficiently grave or acute to warrant special reference to it. Section 103 is, however, in my opinion, a necessary and useful means of protection against all situations of such character.

4. Intended operation of section 103: Fair principles of taxation have been laid down in a large number of bilateral treaties affecting the question of international double taxation. The fundamental principles of jurisdiction and methods of allocation in the revenue acts of the United States are for the most part fully in accord with the generally accepted and sound principles governing such questions. Consequently, the President will have generally accepted criteria for determining whether a foreign tax is discriminatory or extraterritorial. The intent of section 103 is that if the attention of the President is directed to a foreign tax which seems to so flagrantly violate accepted criteria of international taxation as to bring it within the category of a discriminatory or extraterritorial tax, he will cause inquiry to be made into the situation for the purpose of determining whether, as a matter of fact, American citizens or corporations are being actually subjected to such discriminatory or extraterritorial taxes. It would seem natural that in the course of such an investigation representations or inquiries would be made to the government of a foreign country, or the matter would otherwise come to its attention, and that an opportunity would be given for the foreign country to remove the discriminatory or extraterritorial features of its tax. It would also seem natural that the President, through his executive offices, might obtain an agreement from such foreign country to remove such features. If this were done, there would be no occasion for the President to issue such proclamation, and the section would have accomplished its result in an amicable manner. It would be only cases where the foreign country persisted in its efforts to collect such unjust taxes from American corporations that it would be necessary to issue the proclamation, with the consequent extra burden of taxation thereby imposed upon the citizens and corporations of such foreign countries.

I am informed that the treaty with France was presented for ratification to the French Parliament on or about March 15, but was not acted upon because of the adjournment of the Parliament. Ratification of this treaty by the French Parliament in the near future would clearly make unnecessary a proclamation by the President under this section.

THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the press this morning announces the abolition of the N.R.A. compliance board as having been ordered yesterday by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson in a major reorganization step that included a move to rationalize the service codes. The work of the board, so the dispatch declares, will be taken over by the recently formed compliance division. The order summarily removed William H. Davis, board director, who incurred Johnson's displeasure for his decisions in recent compliance cases.

I know nothing of the merit of the compliance board or of Mr. Davis. Perhaps his discharge is entirely deserved by reason of his record and the record of his board. Possibly, also, Mr. Davis is being discharged before he has an opportunity to quit, as we understand so many of the more important figures in the N.R.A. organization are planning immediately following the adjournment of Congress to sever their connection with the N.R.A. But if it be, as it may well be, merely the case of another official being discharged because he disagreed with General Johnson, then I should like to suggest what a marvelous display we would have if General Johnson could discharge any and all individuals, boards, and commissions who or which have disagreed with him in his administration of N.R.A.

First of all, if it were left to Mr. Johnson, there would be an immediate beheading of this, as Mr. Richberg calls it, "Anarchistic Darrow Review Board." Then, in the second place, I presume it would be entirely agreeable to Mr. Johnson if there could be decreed the death of the Consumers' Advisory Board, which he himself created within N.R.A., but whose recommendations he has not heeded in any such degree as to invite the continued confidence of that particular board.

Then, with the review board and the Consumers' Advisory Council removed from the picture, General Johnson would undoubtedly bring about, if he could, as he can, the discharge of the Research and Planning Commission, which he created within N.R.A. The Research and Planning Commission is another one of those creatures set up to do worth-while things, but whose recommendations have not been worth shaking one's finger at so far as General Johnson's attitude has been concerned.

Then, having accomplished the discharge and discontinuation of those boards and commissions, of course, General Johnson would want to do away with and would want to accomplish the outright junking of the terrible Federal Trade Commission which has so thoroughly disagreed with him respecting the making and enforcement of many of the codes.

With all that done, of course, there would remain one thing for General Johnson to do, and that would be to abolish, by constitutional amendment, the Congress of the United States, or, failing in that, at least to get rid of the Congress for the summer. Then, having accomplished that object, General Johnson, of course, would want to expedite with all the power at his command the departure of the President for Hawaii for many, many weeks. What a delightful opportunity then would exist for General Johnson, Mr. Richberg, and their associates within N.R.A. What a marvelous opportunity to demonstrate what "cracking down" can really mean. With that sort of opportunity, and in the light of what has happened in the past, it is fair to assume that small business enterprises in America would experience such a storm as they have never known could exist in this great land of the free and home of the brave.

Mr. LONG rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NYE. I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana in just a moment.

Under such favorable conditions General Johnson, of course, could perform for the interests of monopoly a much finer service than he has been able to perform thus far with the boards, commissions, Congress, and the President himself on the ground and watching to see what was going on. Indeed, what a summer it would be for Johnson and Richberg. What a summer for the American plunderbund.

But I want to urge upon the President, if I can make my voice heard at the White House, that when Congress shall have gone and he is planning his departure for Hawaii, "For Heaven's sake, take Mr. Johnson along to Hawaii with you." Take him down there where perhaps he can find something to do in the way of creating a code for the Sugar Trust. I have not any doubt that the Pineapple Trust there would appreciate one of the fine monopolistic codes which have served so well those who have sought for years for favors they have not received until N.R.A. came into being under the kind of administration it has had.

I yield now to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to suggest that General Johnson would amend the Constitution in order to make his power more complete. The Senator might better suggest a less cumbersome system. The General does not need to go that route to amend the Constitution. That is no longer necessary. An Executive order has a great deal more effect than an amendment to the Constitution, especially more effect than a mere act of Congress. I think the Senator from North Dakota is not doing General Johnson justice, because an executive decree from the pen of Mr. "Hooey" Johnson, under the seal of N.R.A., wipes out State laws and State statutes, and at least shelves the Constitution.

Mr. NYE. I am exceedingly sorry if I am not doing General Johnson justice.

There is, it seems to me, one point upon which there is quite general agreement, and that is that N.R.A., under its leadership, has taken in far too much territory. I mean that originally it was intended that codes should be made to apply to a few of the outstanding industries in the country; that in those industries an effort should be made to accomplish those finer, fairer practices in trade which were so desperately needed in some lines. But, instead of confining the effort in the main to a program of doing away with child labor, bringing about shorter working hours, and a better minimum rate of wage—instead of confining themselves to those things, N.R.A. leadership became obsessed with the thought that every industry in the United States, no matter what its line of enterprise might be, should be brought under a code; and the codes have invariably worked terrible hardship upon people whom it never was intended should be jeopardized any further than they already were by the kind of competition which monopoly was affording.

The coremaking has been carried on to a point where enforcement is many times more difficult than was ever the problem of enforcing prohibition. America, it seems to me, pretty clearly determined that enforcement of the provisions of the prohibition amendment was utterly impossible, and the American people wanted to be done with it. In any event here we are today with a job on our hands, if we are sincere, of striving to enforce these many, many codes which have been provided, while on every hand is evidence galore that there not only is lack of enforcement but lack of any endeavor on the part of N.R.A. to enforce, particularly when the complaints regarding compliance are filed against the big favored ones who have fared so well under the code system.

In the matter of enforcement there have been numerous instances where some little cleaner or pants presser in the country has been dragged into court and made the subject of large headline display and punished for having pressed a pair of pants for 45 cents when the code said he should charge 50 cents.

But when the great industries, when our great American monopolists, have operated under their codes in a way that has invited complaint, as complaints have been filed by the thousand, there has been hardly a finger raised by N.R.A. to enforce compliance or even to call to the attention of those monopolists that they were betraying the faith and confidence which had been bestowed when they were given one of the codes under which business was going to regulate itself. Enforcement has been most partial.

Mr. President, I am reliably advised that departments of N.R.A. have received complaints literally by the thousand regarding refusal or failure of business to comply with codes; that N.R.A. officials who have been in line to receive these complaints have tried diligently to get the ear of General Johnson and have him give heed to the complaints which were coming in, but all to no avail. General Johnson has no time for smaller things like that. There are bigger things to be done, and the matter of compliance with codes can wait until others can take care of it.

Mr. President, I challenge the Administrator of N.R.A. to publish a complete showing of the percentage of settlements which have been accomplished out of the compliance complaints which have been filed. In the Pittsburgh area alone it can be shown that in not more than 9 percent of the cases have complaints been received by N.R.A. and prosecuted to accomplished enforcement with any success whatsoever. The delays which accompany these appeals for compliance are, of course, to those who are trying to play ball, who are trying to do their part, distressing, provoking to a degree that finds today those people demoralized who a few weeks ago were overly anxious to cooperate and do their part to accomplish national recovery. Their spirit—and my mail reveals it more and more every morning—is quite completely crushed; their hopes are quite completely vanished, as respects accomplishment under the National Recovery set-up in the hands of those who are administering it at the present time.

Confidence that fair play would be the accomplishment on every hand has vanished. It has flown. It does not exist as it did a few weeks ago, all for one reason—all because it has fast dawned upon the American people that N.R.A. is in the hands of its enemies, not in the hands of those who would make N.R.A. accomplish the things which Congress had in mind when it created the machinery which has afforded this recovery set-up. There is not a sincere desire, it seems, to enforce upon big offenders under the code as there is desire to enforce here and there a code as it applies to some smaller, lesser offender.

Today we are confronted by a thing which seems to me most important for our congressional consideration. Big business has been kept in some little order during the formation of these codes and during the life under the codes up to this time. It has hesitated to go forward as it would like to go forward and reap the whole benefit that might come to it under the code. It has feared to do so because it has recognized that the President sat back there in his place with a club—a club in the form of a licensing feature that he could invoke if business would not behave itself.

Now, we are told by General Johnson that there is no longer need for this licensing feature. He is not going to ask Congress to renew it. He has made it rather clear that he is not going to ask Congress for a renewal, because he realizes that if Congress goes into this thing in any small part, Heaven alone knows what Congress is going to do to the entire machinery of N.R.A. He does not openly declare that this is the reason for not asking for renewal of the licensing feature. Instead, he says, "We do not need it"; and when he says, "We do not need it", he speaks the wishes, he speaks the interests of the great monopolists of America, who have enthroned themselves as never before under these codes, who have gone out and created the codes, who have chosen the men who are to sit on these code authorities.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. The monopolist today finds himself with a marvelous opportunity, if no one interferes with him, to go forward as he has never gone forward before in reaping for the executives of his corporation larger bonuses, in reaping for his stockholders larger dividend checks, but he is not at any time particularly interested in the size of the pay checks of the employees of his corporation. So do not, for heaven's sake, give back to the President of the United States the licensing club which he could use if big business should take very unfair advantage under these codes. With the death of the licensing feature, which is only a week or two away, business will be able to say, "Now we have the whole machinery. N.R.A. and all its advantages which we have created are ours; and there is not a power on earth that can interfere with us, no matter how brazen the American public may feel we have become in our profiteering under these codes."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I wanted to say to the Senator, in line with his remarks about monopolists proceeding with the power of the Government, that the independent oil people of the Southern and Southwestern States made a fight extending over 20 years to try to get some regulation against the monopolistic practices of the Oil Trust. Some of those battles were waged over many years. We suddenly found every bit of our legislation wiped out in one of the far-reaching regulations under this code provision, and the Oil Trust became the power of the Government, upsetting our State law and paying practically no attention to it, although we thought we had written into the national law something that would compel them to make their pipe lines a common utility; but nothing of the kind happened. They just used the law to undo what the State had done up to that time.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, reverting to the evident desire of business to get away from the licensing feature, and to deny to the President a renewal of the privilege which is now his to license and in that manner to govern business and the use it makes of these codes, I desire to say that if Congress can shut its eyes, if Congress can just blind itself to what may be in the making, and can rush away from here without taking any action, without doing anything that will seem to curb those who are riding so high these days, if I am not mistaken Congress sooner or later will have its eyes opened to the fact that it overlooked an opportunity to salvage, that it overlooked an opportunity to save those things within N.R.A. that are worth saving, that ought to be saved. It will awaken to the fact that the entire ship has gone down under a policy of cracking down so severe that the only hope, the only accomplishment hoped for, is that of a cracking-up of the entire structure.

General Johnson and his associates declare that the Darrow Review Board's findings reveal no substantial showing of monopoly. Yet, Mr. President, close study of the Darrow Review Board's report reveals that existing monopoly has been placed in a much stronger position than it ever before has occupied, and reveals further that in fields where monopoly has not existed particularly in the past, new fields for monopoly are being created. The Review Board has found most emphatic evidence that some of the codes are in aid of monopoly and oppressive of small industry; but the General, in that military spirit, is not going to admit that he has made any mistakes, is not going to admit that anyone can discover that anything he has done has been wrong. Boldly and brazenly he is going to insist upon the public accepting him as being one who could not make a mistake, one who is the victim of those who would cause him political embarrassment and cause the administration political embarrassment. Like the general of all times who has gone out with his forces upon the battlefield, he may foolishly surrender the lives of thousands upon thousands of his men, but he never admits during his lifetime that he made a mistake. He will always insist that if he had it to do over again, he would do it in the same identical way.

Mr. President, from day to day, and with the very best of intent, I shall seek minutes of the time of the Senate to discuss the Review Board's findings as they relate to the various codes that have been studied, and to concern myself with the replies to those findings and those studies which have come from Mr. Johnson, Mr. Richberg, and other lesser lights in the N.R.A. organization.

Today I had planned to discuss the findings of the Board as they relate to the steel code. I am going to beg another day of time to prepare to do that very thing; but in that connection I do think attention ought to be called to the fact that the counsel for N.R.A., Mr. Richberg, has very viciously attacked the Federal Trade Commission because of the Federal Trade Commission's findings respecting monopoly being permitted to continue to exist by the N.R.A. code which the steel industry has won. Why does he object? Again because it must not, at this stage of the N.R.A. campaign, be admitted that monopoly has enjoyed any favor under N.R.A. More than that, there has existed from the beginning a terrible jealousy on the part of N.R.A. toward the Federal Trade Commission. An attitude has been assumed in N.R.A. that has said in effect, "The Federal Trade Commission does not know what it is talking about. The Federal Trade Commission has not caught up with the new spirit, with the new deal. We are going to ignore the Federal Trade Commission, because they are not in step with the present day and with the trend of this hour of the new deal."

But, regardless of what Mr. Richberg may say about the steel code, I say, Mr. President, that the steel code has given greater favor to monopoly than monopoly has ever enjoyed heretofore at the hands of Government. Never has anything of its kind been permitted by the Government as it is being practiced day after day with the aid of Government by the great steel corporations today.

I think perhaps, rather than discuss at this time the report of the Darrow Board as it relates to the steel code, I can better read an article appearing in the May 23, 1934, issue of the Nation under the title, "Magna Carta of Monopoly." It has to do with the steel code. Incidentally they are still spelling it "s-t-e-e-l"; but sooner or later the public, when it refers to the steel code, is going to refer to it as the "s-t-e-a-l" code. The American people have had burdened upon them, by reason of this steel code, such monopoly as the Nation has never before known. I hope the Senate will follow this story by the editors of the Nation:

> During the feverish days when leaders of the steel industry were discussing the proposed code of fair competition prior to its submission to the N.R.A., one of the lesser rulers asked one of the greater ones to explain a certain obscure provision. The latter replied without a moment's hesitation: "There is no mystery about this code. It just means that the industry is going to be run as it always has been run, only more so." The last three words furnish the key to an understanding of the steel code, and, indeed, to an understanding of the basic philosophy of the industry for the last three decades. This philosophy has always placed primary emphasis upon preservation of the status quo in prices, in production, in markets, and in the corporate and geographic structure of the industry. The cardinal sin has been for one producer to "get more than his share of the business", especially if the additional orders were obtained by quoting prices lower than his competitors. Competition in any form has come to be regarded as at best an ungentlemanly practice; albeit no member of the industry can claim to have behaved always as a gentleman should.
> It is not surprising, therefore, that after a formal and hypocritical obeisance in the direction of collective bargaining the steel code should be concerned primarily with the creation of an almost perfect technique whereby prices can be controlled by the dominant interests of the industry. Even in these days of economic and legal miracles, however, it is almost incredible that this Magna Carta of monopoly should have been written into the law of the land with the solemn assurance of the Administrator of the N.R.A. that it would not "permit monopolies or monopolistic practices."

Let it be borne in mind that every code which has been carried by General Johnson to the President for his approval has had to be accompanied by a certificate that nothing in the code would permit monopolies or monopolistic practices. But let us see what got into this one lone code—and what got into that code in very large measure got into other codes:

> The system for price quotation established in the code is designed to result in uniform delivered prices on any one product to any one buyer. It commences with the requirement that each producer must file a quotation on each of his products with the board of directors of the American Iron and Steel Institute, which is the code authority of the industry. Producers may not, however, file or quote prices at their own mills, since that practice would make the goal of price uniformity difficult or impossible to achieve. Instead, prices must be quoted at certain common "basing points" established in the code. These basing-point quotations are either identical at the time they are filed or become so almost immediately, since producers are informed promptly of the prices quoted by their competitors. In view of the provision for a "10-day waiting period" before a new price can become effective, it is apparent that powerful group pressure can be brought to bear upon any chiseler who seeks to indulge in the unsportsmanlike practice of cutting prices.
> If worst comes to worst and the recalcitrant member refuses to listen to reason, the most amazing provision of the entire code may be invoked. This permits the board of directors "to investigate any base price for any product at any basing point", and if it determines that such price is "an unfair base price * * * having regard to the cost of manufacturing such product", the board "may require" the seller to file a new base quotation which the board considers fair. If this fails, the board is empowered to fix a "fair base quotation" which "shall be the base price" of the erring member until changed as provided in the code.
> When it is remembered that the system established in the code, of plural voting based upon volume of sales, is such as to insure control by the two or three largest steel producers, and that the Government representatives who attend meetings of the code authority have no authority to veto or modify its actions, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the steel code not only permits "monopolistic practices" but actually establishes and legalizes a full-fledged monopoly.

I remind the Senate that the publication from which I read is the current number of The Nation, the pages of which have contained eloquent eulogies of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, the pages of which have severely attacked critics of General Johnson and the policies he has been pursuing under N.R.A.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there any doubt that the process which the Senator is describing would be a criminal offense under the statutes of the United States if it were not for the temporary repeal of the antitrust laws under the N.R.A. Act?

Mr. NYE. My answer is that there is no question whatsoever about that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, they would be eligible for the penitentiary?

Mr. NYE. They would be eligible for the penitentiary, quite so; but under the N.R.A. they enjoy the blessing of Government to go ahead and entrench themselves more and more thoroughly, and agents for the Government, like General Johnson, look on and smile and say, "Go ahead, boys, and enjoy the picking while the picking is good."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has the Senator any figures or facts which would give a citizen any information as to how much this type of industry is paying for such immunity in the way of code administration?

Mr. NYE. I am sorry to have to say to the Senator that I do not have that information, but it is information which the Senate ought to have, not only with respects to this one code but as to all of them, and I repeat, if Congress hastens itself out of Washington, leaves here with its eyes closed to the seriousness of this situation, it will come back in the fall much wiser, but regretting that it did not act while there was time to act.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the Senator that while my information may not be accurate, I have heard it stated that the administration of the codes as they are now being operated is costing something in excess of a billion dollars a year.

It is not the industries which are paying this price, but it is the consumers who buy the products who are paying.

Mr. NYE. Always the consumer pays the bill.

I continue reading from this article in the current number of the Nation:

The powers of the code authority are not limited to the right to fix prices, nor does the system of price control end with the establishment of uniform quotations at the basing points. From the time the base quotations are filed, the code itself prescribes in meticulous detail the various additional charges according to which the ultimate delivered price is automatically calculated. Price identity is further maintained by the establishment and control of resale prices on steel products sold through jobbers, by rigid regulation and specification of terms of sale, cash discounts, credit terms, maximum deductions, and minimum charges for "extras." Price-cutting loopholes of almost every conceivable variety have been foreseen and corked up. In every phase of the administration of the code enormous powers are given to the board of directors of the steel institute.

Spelled again, "s-t-e-e-l."

It combines within itself the functions of policeman, prosecuting attorney, judge, and jury, as well as certain legislative powers, all of which in the aggregate give it absolute control not only over the economic destinies of the firms in the industry but over consumers of steel, transportation agencies, and, indeed, the economic welfare of entire communities.

The steel code originally went into effect on August 19, 1933, for a 90-day trial period, at the end of which it was again extended to May 31, 1934. The N.R.A. must now recommend to the President whether the code shall be canceled, revised, or extended.

The N.R.A. must now recommend to the President whether the code shall be canceled, revised, or extended.

I want to impress upon the Senate that point. The privileges under that code run only to the 29th day of this month. I shall make reference to that a little later.

Assuming that the administration has no present intention of abandoning its experiment with "codes of fair competition", three courses of action appear to be possible—all of them beset with difficulties. The steel code can be extended without substantial modification, in which case the administration will find it difficult to refuse to extend to other industries the "privileges" which have been accorded to the steel industry. The Administrator can attempt to secure substantial modification of the code, involving the elimination of price-fixing and other monopolistic provisions. Or the Government can confer upon the steel industry the status of a public utility, which would involve the same kind of control by it over prices and competitive practices as is now exercised over the railroads through the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Obviously the steel industry will not willingly accept either of the last two alternatives, and a recent comment by General Johnson, to the effect that the code is in the main acceptable to him as it stands, suggests that he will not try for drastic changes through compulsion. That may be the easiest way out for him, but it is far from the best course from the standpoint of the public.

Is there monopoly? Have these codes created a monopoly? Is the Federal Trade Commission justified in the findings which it has made regarding the tendency to improve conditions for monopoly under the steel code? Is Mr. Richberg justified in attacking the Federal Trade Commission because it finds these practices existing under the steel code?

Mr. President, there is monopoly under these codes as there was never monopoly before, and when Mr. Richberg and his associates take the attitude they do in fighting every individual, in fighting every agency, official or organized, that dares to criticize them, they are engaging in nothing other than rank, base deception, as they have been since the middle of last fall.

But we are told in their way, "Oh, there are some things that are wrong. Surely some things are wrong, but we are going to make changes. We are going to correct those ills." I ask, when—pray tell, when are those changes coming? I have heard that kind of assurance since the middle of last August, and I have not seen in more than a very small percentage any fulfillment of the promises.

Very interesting indeed it is to note, Mr. President, that the steel code expires on May 29—this month. Their 90-day extension period is then up. A renewal is in order, or, as I read from the Nation, it is now up to the President to renew, extend, or cancel the steel code, which has worked such vicious hardship upon the buyers of steel and the consumers of America.

The price structure within that code is the heart of the code. Take away the ability of the steel industry to determine their basing points, to fix prices, and they will not tolerate a code. They have said as much. The N.R.A. officials, on the other hand, have declared time and time again, and the President has declared, that we had to get away from these price-fixing features and would get away from them.

On the 29th day of this month N.R.A. and the steel institute are "going to bat" regarding the renewal of that code. The steel institute is going to say to N.R.A.: "If you take out that price-fixing structure we will not concur in any code, and we will pull a 'Henry Ford' and go out on our own and conduct our own business. We are declining to cooperate with you unless you give us this thing which we want, this thing which we have had, and this thing which we are going to continue to have if we are going to play ball with you at all."

Might that give any special meaning to the urge and determination to get the Congress out of Washington, to get the President out of Washington, to get the Darrow Review Board out of Washington, to quiet for all time the Federal Trade Commission, to seal up in a room down there in the N.R.A. headquarters the Consumers' Advisory Council and the Planning and Coordinating Commissions?

Mr. President, it seems to me that the most embarrassing thing that can be upon the doorstep of Mr. Johnson on the 29th day of this month and thereafter is the existence of anybody in Washington that is going to stand in the way of his granting to the steel institute and the Steel Trust what they want if they are going to continue playing ball with N.R.A.

But the urge is upon us—get rid of the review board, cut off its head, do not tolerate it for a minute. It is anarchistic, it is socialistic, it is communistic. Get it out of the picture. They are embarassing us around here. And I rather guess, from what I see and hear, that they will be gotten out of the picture unless Congress or one or the other of the two Houses of the Congress shall stand up and protest against what is in prospect this summer, barring any actions or any precautions taken by Congress to still, to quiet, to control those who are exercising such damnable authority as was never before given into the hands of single individuals by Congress or this Government.

Mr. President, N.R.A. was going to afford larger employment; N.R.A. was conceived in an hour when we were agreed that there had been too much business for profit and too little business for the happiness and pleasure and comfort of the workers of America. Under the old deal, profit was the great cause of every move that the Congress made or that the agencies of the Government made in aiding business.

Moves were made which would bring about larger profits, create larger dividend checks; make it possible for Mr. Schwab and Mr. Grace to continue robbing their steel stockholders in the form of bonuses from year to year, bonuses which in 1 year, in Mr. Schwab's case, amounted, as I remember, to something like $1,600,000, in addition to the stupendous salary he was drawing.

Under the new deal, as administered by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, "profit" remains the watchword, and the worker be damned! And sooner or later every American is going to know that to have been a fact and a practice under his administration up to this point.

Let us see what is happening under N.R.A. Let us see why it is that some few industrialists cheer N.R.A. while day after day the workers by the scores, by the thousands, are moving out on strike. In the current number of the Nation, May 23, which has been so friendly to N.R.A., which has upheld the hand of General Johnson at every turn, there is an editorial entitled "Where We Stand." Listen to it:

The individual worker in industry made no appreciable gain in real wages from March 1933, when the new deal began, to March 1934.

Do I need repeat that?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has not the worker actually lost because of the increase in the cost of living?

Mr. NYE. Let us see just what has happened according to this writer. Referring to the worker, he writes:

His average weekly wage increased 9.7 percent, but the cost of living rose 9.3. Hours of work were 2.4 percent shorter per week in March 1934, but they are being lengthened as productive activity increases. Over 10,900,000 workers are still unemployed. In February 1934, there were more families on relief, either direct or C.W.A., than in February of last year.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. While the hours were reduced, the workmen's wages were likewise reduced. In other words, the workman lost the opportunity to make wages during the hours he lost. When his hours were reduced, down went the wage he was paid.

Mr. NYE. Just so. The Nation editorial goes on:

These figures come not from sources opposed to the N.R.A. but from the Monthly Survey of Business issued by the American Federation of Labor, which has worked hand in glove with the administration. They are compiled from such stately authorities as the Annalist, the New York Times' weekly index, the National Industrial Conference Board, and the United States Government. From June to October 1933 hours were shortened, the number of unemployed was reduced from 13,689,000 to 10,122,000, and the total monthly income of workers in industry increased by $200,000,000. Employers, in desperation, were following Dr. Roosevelt's prescriptions.

After October * * * there was a change of policy in N.R.A.; emphasis was placed on assistance to vested interests. * * * This spring, with production and business activity rising, profits considerably higher than a year ago, business men were far more able to shorten work hours, and put men to work, but they are no longer willing to do so.

Between October and March, although business was steadily improving, the number of unemployed rose by 780,000.

We have said real wages did not rise during the year. But the profits of the first 51 industrial corporations to report their earnings for the first quarter of 1934 increased from $6,332,000 in 1933 to $18,740,000. Moreover, the Alexander Hamilton Institute points out that the value of output per man per hour in manufacturing industry increased considerably, both in the period of high industrial activity last spring and in the first month of this year. In February, the organization states, the value of output per man-hour warranted a 13.9 percent increase in wage rates. But the increase in productivity did not go into wages. It went into dividends. The survey cites a case history that is revealing. A certain large manufacturing corporation in the Middle West produced in 1932, 563,000 units at a cost of $752 per unit; in 1933, by increasing production to 869,000 units, costs were reduced to $567 per unit. The wage cost per unit was reduced from $254 to $197, or 22.6 percent, and the value produced per dollar paid in wages increased from $3.02 to $3.32, or 10 percent. But the wages were not increased; profits increased from $16,500,000 to $83,214,000 and an extra dividend was paid to the stockholders.

But nothing to the workers.

With such figures as these before him—

The editor of the Nation goes on—how can Mr. Roosevelt fail to see that, instead of dropping the power to license business, he should insist that the Congress renew it? He should use that power to the full in forcing business to divide its profits now that there are profits and to create the mass purchasing power which, according to his own theory, capitalism must have in order to survive.

In the light of those facts, of profits increasing from $16,000,000 to $83,000,000, with no increase for the wage earner, why should we wonder that more and more frequently strikes are springing up all over this country, displeasure is coming to the surface, men are showing a fighting spirit and a madness that might easily lead us to most severe consequences during the summer and fall unless remedies may be applied.

Mr. President, from day to day I plan to discuss the various codes which have been reviewed by the Darrow review board, and the responses which have been made by the N.R.A. and other agencies to the findings of that board. I mean to discuss the bituminous code in which the Darrow board recommend the discharge of certain code authorities for malfeasance in office. N.R.A. laughs it off, but let it be said that the Department of Justice sent to the Pittsburgh area men to investigate the charges which have been preferred, and those Department agents are now there, studying the situation to ascertain directly and definitely what are the facts. Let us hope that it means that there will quickly be accomplished the elimination from this program of those men who have so abused the privilege which was theirs by reason of their membership upon a code authority.

I mean, too, to discuss from the standpoint of the Darrow review board's views and the responses made by governmental agencies, the ice code, the steel code, the cleaning-and-dyeing code, the electrical-manufacturing code, and the other codes which have been reviewed by the Darrow board. Today I am going to confine myself briefly to the moving-picture code which was reviewed by the Darrow review board and which has been commented on by Mr. Johnson, Mr. Richberg, and the Deputy Administrator Mr. Rosenblatt.

The moving-picture code is a splendid example of what some people seem to mean when they refer to the self-regulation of business. The booking situation existing in the moving-picture field has been such in times past that it has occasioned endless consideration of legislation looking to the correction of the abuses which existed under the plans which were being pursued. Now, under the code there has been an enlargment of the abuses about which we have known all these years, and we have placed into the hands of the so-called "code authority of the moving-picture code" the power to go out and regulate itself. When we see how they are doing the job we are straightway forced to go back to the words uttered by President Roosevelt himself, when he declared most emphatically that no business has ever been known to purge itself of its own iniquities; and yet the most iniquitous ones of the whole lot are back there in a most powerful position today by reason of these codes, governing themselves; correcting the iniquities within their own ranks.

Mr. President, 66 pages or more than 40 percent of the entire response of the National Recovery Administration to the report of the National Recovery Review Board consists of extravagant lines by the Deputy Administrator in charge of the motion-picture code, Mr. Rosenblatt. In addition to devoting numerous paragraphs throughout the report to self-commendation, he has devoted the entire final 20 pages of his comments to the erection of a memorial in honor of himself. He reaches his complimentary peak on page 54 of that report where he claims a status to which I will admit he may be entitled. I read that climax:

"Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." How much wiser is the man who rushes in where angels have already trodden.

The Deputy Administrator first concerns himself with the length of the hearings conducted by the Board as contrasted with the "79 days and nights of continuous labor upon the code" accepted by "the overwhelming majority" of all interests in the industry. All this would appear to be beside the point, in view of the undisputed fact that there are numerous complaints against the provisions of this code.

I am prepared to agree with the Deputy Administrator's description of the number and variety of problems involved in preparing the code for this industry, but I cannot permit the presumption to arise that because of the long period of its consideration the resultant code is sublimely endowed with celestial perfection.

The deputy is greatly concerned in his comments about the Board's treatment of the statement of the seven producing companies, which was filed at the end of the hearing. Contrary to his conception of the agreement as to its treatment, the record shows that it was not to be received as evidence, but in lieu of agreement of counsel at the conclusion of the hearings. Obviously, argument of counsel can have no probative value.

The deputy can make no point of the testimony being unsworn, inasmuch as N.R.A. witnesses are not sworn; nor can he object to the lack of cross-examination at this hearing, since he could have examined if he had chosen to enter his appearance.

The deputy seeks to mislead the reader by claiming the Review Board's report admits (p. 76 of the report) that the great majority of the sections of the code favor exhibitors. An examination of the report discloses no such admission. On the contrary, the report contains vigorous and detailed denials that any section favors anyone but the distributors.

Part III of the deputy's response announces that "the report of the National Recovery Review Board is based on false testimony", and proceeds to attack isolated statements of some witnesses, which statements are not necessary to support the Board's findings. What a pity, what a pity, indeed, the deputy himself was too busy to attend the hearings so as to put in evidence these inconsequential objections! Their presence in the record would more clearly demonstrate his most feeble defense.

Part IV of his response, under the title "Repudiation of Complaining Witnesses by Independent Exhibitors" is a continuation of the deputy's persistent policy of damning all protesting minorities.

The contrasting of the solvency of the independents with the insolvency and bankruptcy of the large producers is misleading, since it assumes that the producers achieve their present status as a natural result of business competition. Anyone familiar with the stock manipulations of the large companies could speedily correct such a fraudulent inference.

Part V of Mr. Rosenblatt's response, under the title "Analysis of the Recommendations of the Report" (p. 46), is an analysis in name only. The deputy in this section takes up each revision suggested by the Review Board's report and discusses it in his inimitably evasive manner. In view of the indisputable fairness of the suggested revisions, it would appear that the deputy's almost profane attack upon them is considerably colored by his deserved fear for his own job. His unreasonable attitude in the matter is strikingly portrayed on page 54, wherein he upbraids the Board for withholding a report as to the labor provisions. He devotes two pages to rantings and ravings concerning attacks upon the labor provisions, when not a single recommendation in regard to these provisions is contained in the report of the Review Board. Literally he has a "chip on his shoulder" and will not agree with the Review Board or anyone else who may seek to criticize his acts.

As to the other parts of the "analysis", they consist of frantic defenses based on unfair statements of conditions and only partial quotations of provisions in the present code.

Let us take up the recommendation of the Board and compare them with the deputy's alleged answers contained in his "analysis."

The Board's report changes the definition of an affiliated dealer by denying the distributor the right to lease a theater to a "straw man" and have him classed as an independent exhibitor. The deputy terms this "trivial" and "unsound." He says:

> Unaffiliated exhibitors who in good faith have taken advantage of the distress of affiliated circuit operation and had acquired, under lease, such theaters for independent unaffiliated operation would nevertheless be deemed affiliated operators of unentitled-to designation on various grievance and clearance and zoning boards.

This statement is untrue, inasmuch as the grievance and clearance and zoning boards do not deny an affiliated exhibitor representation. He would be represented on these boards as an affiliated exhibitor, instead of as an unaffiliated exhibitor. It is hard to see how this change in classification would be in any way detrimental.

The Board's report provides for the setting up of an entirely new method of selecting the code authority, for the reason that the code provides no means of electing a code authority but merely names 10 men who are declared to be the code authority. Does this unusual method of naming the code authority in the code itself exist in any other code? It shows the extent to which the monopoly went to insure the continuation of its control.

The deputy does not explain why this method of selecting the authority should obtain in this one code of the almost 400 now approved, other than to aver that the independents are too unorganized to take part in an election. Would it not be better to have no code at all than to deny a large part of the industry the opportunity to elect representatives because of the difficulty of holding an election? It should be made to be representative in the manner advised by the Board, or in some other way.

Incidentally, assuming that the decisions of the code authority to date have been fair in all respects, it might be safe to assume that that fairness has been dictated by the presence and restraining influence of the National Recovery Review Board, now sought to be abolished so summarily by General Johnson.

The Board made no recommendations in regard to the labor provisions of the code, yet the deputy spent two pages of valuable space trying to draw the Board into a controversy into which it had refused to advance.

The code contains a provision supposedly reducing the number of short subjects which the distributor might require the exhibitor to take. The Board amended this provision so as actually to reduce the number. In defense of the provision of the code, the deputy states that this provision provides:

> That distributor may not require exhibitor, as a condition for the licensing of feature photoplays, to license more than a corresponding proportion of the short subjects required by the exhibitor. By reason of this device the short-subject licenses of the various distributors are so proportioned that in no event may the exhibitor be required to license more than 100 percent of his needs.

This statement of the deputy proves one of two things: (1) That the deputy does not know as much about this industry and code as his lengthy defense of himself would lead one to believe; or (2) he is guilty of a deliberate falsehood, first, because he deliberately ignores the plainly printed exceptions of news reels; second, because what the provision actually provides is as follows:

> Part 5. No distributor shall require as a condition of entering into a contract for licensing of the exhibition of feature motion pictures that the exhibitor contract also for the licensing of the exhibition of a greater number of short subjects (excepting news-reels), in proportion to the total number of short subjects required by such exhibitor, than the proportion of the feature pictures for which a contract is negotiated bears to the total number of feature pictures required by the exhibitor.

Obviously, from this, the proportion of the number of short subjects which the distributor may require an exhibitor to take and the number of short subjects which the needs is the same, under this provision, as the proportion of the number of featured pictures which a distributor may force him to take, to the number of features which he needs. For example, if an exhibitor needs 100 features and 200 shorts, not news-reels, and the disetributor, under practice of block-booking, forces the exhibitor to take 200 features, twice what he needs, he may then force the exhibitor to take 400 shorts, twice what he needs, under the code provision. Certainly that would be forcing the exhibitor to take more than 100 percent of his needs.

If the deputy was as active as he proclaims he was in formulating this code, and if he knows as much as he boasts he does about the industry, he could hardly fail to recognize the purport of the provision. Obviously, he thought everyone else would be as incapable of figuring it out as he pretends to be.

In view of this explanation of the provision, the much proclaimed important concession contained therein becomes a mockery. It is the same old wolf in sheep's clothing.

There is a practice in the industry of the distributor's designating the days of the week on which certain features will be shown in his theater by the exhibitor. Where the picture is paid for on a percentage basis, it is obvious that the distributor by picking Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays can exact a greater fee. Where the picture is licensed for a certain sum, however, he cares not as to the day of showing. This practice is obviously unfair to the exhibitor since it extracts undue sums from him, prevents his choosing the most suitable picture for his clientele and for the date on which the picture is shown, and it gives the distributors control of the playing time of the exhibitor.

The deputy passes off all these objections by stating that "none of the rights granted to the independent exhibitors by this provision of the code existed prior thereto." Apparently, he admits that the provision does not do all that it should, but contends that the exhibitors are no worse off than they were before, so they should not object.

Admitting that before the code the distributors had, by contract with the exhibitors, all the powers in this regard sought to be denied by the Board's recommendations, still that would not entitle the distributors to write them into a so-called "code of fair competition", when obviously they are unfair exactions of the producers' monopoly.

The recommendations of the Board seek to correct the injustices of allowing distributors to decide what admission price the exhibitor should charge at his theater, and of allowing distributors to prohibit the exhibitors from showing two features at one performance. Under the code provision the distributor is given the right to continue these oppressive and dictatorial practices by contract.

The deputy devotes himself to long arguments as to the legality of such provisions in a contract. Without discussing the question of legality, it is obvious that a code of fair competition should not take within its sheltering arms such provisions as these, which allow one branch of the industry to exercise unreasonable and unfair control over another.

It can readily be understood that, although certain trade practices cannot be declared illegal, still there is no reason for incorporating them into a code of fair competition. It is bad enough that the law allows these oppressions, without its endeavoring to give them its affirmative approval in a code of fair competition.

The code allows an exhibitor to eliminate 10 percent of the pictures he has contracted for under certain conditions. In view of the fact it has been demonstrated that this is too limited a cancelation privilege, the Board raised the 10 percent to 15 percent, and removed some of the restrictions upon the privilege.

The only answer of the deputy is that this provision affords the greatest cancellation privilege ever accorded the exhibitor. Again I point out, that when a provision has been demonstrated to be unfair, it is no defense to state that it is less unfair than another provision. It still has no place in any code of fair competition.

The remainder of the deputy's reply to this suggested change consisted of criticism of the Board's error in the placing of a decimal point; and now I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this error has since been demonstrated to have been made by the official National Recovery Administration's reporters who transcribed the report.

The deputy then launches into an argumentative defense of the provisions of the code in regard to clearance and zoning and grievance boards, which were suggested to be amended considerably by the Board in an effort to make them fair.

This completes the deputy's "analysis." I submit, Mr. President, that the title "analysis" constitutes a misnomer unparalleled in governmental reports.

Part VI of his report, entitled "The Attack Upon the Deputy Administrator", comprises one third of the deputy's answer. Undoubtedly, as far as the deputy himself is concerned, the meat of his whole answer is in the last title, inasmuch as it contains his extravagant rationalization in defense of his retainer. It devotes page after page of a Government report to pure self-adulation and defense of an injured vanity which could far better have been expounded by the very simple statement, "I love me."

When Mr. Rosenblatt's response was given to the press on Monday morning and published, when independent operators in the moving-picture industry read what Mr. Rosenblatt had to say, and when they read, among other things, that those who had complained about the motion-picture code were inconsequential, no-account members of the industry, just a few who ought not to be heard, Mr. Rosenblatt hit several thousand motion-picture people in this country squarely between the eyes; and not the least offended among them was a former member of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Abram F. Myers, who at the present time is associated with the Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors, and who, after he had read the papers on Monday morning, May 21, wrote me as follows:

SECURITIES BUILDING,
Washington, D.C., May 21, 1934.

DARROW-JOHNSON CONTROVERSY

MY DEAR SENATOR: This association together with other organizations of independent producers, distributors, and exhibitors has been seeking modifications of the motion-picture code.

Members of the association from various parts of the country testified before the National Review Board, and their testimony was supported and supplemented by numerous other witnesses.

The members of the code authority failed to put in an appearance, although they were notified of the hearing and requested to be present. Deputy Administrator Rosenblatt refused in open hearing to take the stand.

We are astonished to read in the morning paper the charge that the Darrow report covering the motion-picture code was based on the one-sided and untruthful testimony of a few malcontents and obstructionists.

If such be the fact, the Congress should be officially apprised thereof, and the Darrow report should be accorded no consideration; if the facts are otherwise, the witnesses who appeared in response to the invitation of the board should be protected against the epithets of the N.R.A. officials.

So far as this association is concerned, it has spent many thousands of dollars and much valuable time in an effort to get a fair code. It has cooperated with the N.R.A. in every way consistent with the rights of its members.

We feel that if the matter is allowed to rest in its present state, with the truth of the charges and countercharges undetermined, nothing will have been gained and those who testified before the Darrow board will be further discriminated against.

We respectfully suggest that the Senate make a thorough-going and impartial investigation of the entire subject, including the manner of the writing of the motion-picture code, its provisions, the manner in which it is being administered, as well as the conduct of both the N.R.A. and the Review Board in respect of the code.

Yours very respectfully,

ABRAM F. MYERS.

HON. GERALD P. NYE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

In the light of the showing made there, which is a showing that many other independent institutions in the country can make if they take the time, why do we not fall in line with the spirit which is prevailing more and more each hour over in the House, which is declaring for the need of a sweeping investigation by the Congress, declaring for the need of a continuation of the work inaugurated by the Darrow Review Board?

It seems to me to be an obligation upon us as a Congress to decline to leave here until there has been absolute assurance that the infamous ills that have crept into these codes shall be eliminated, and eliminated expeditiously.

As a general thing, I take the word of men. I like to take the word of all men; but when a man who, 6 months ago, told me that certain things were going to be done that have not been done since, stands up today and says, "Yes; there is a wrong here and a wrong there, but we are going to change it", frankly, I cannot take that man's word very seriously.

Mr. President, let us demonstrate before we leave here this spring that we meant precisely what we said when, in cooperating in the new deal, we declared: "We shall make mistakes, and when we discover mistakes that we have made we shall stop and correct them; or, if we fail in one undertaking, we shall try another method of reaching the recovery goal." If we will do that, Mr. President, if we will do our part, we shall save what is destined to destruction under the present course. We shall save those worth-while things that are to be found under N.R.A.

When the Darrow Review Board, 17 days before the report was made public, carried its report to the White House, the White House announced that copies of the report would be sent to N.R.A. itself, to the Federal Trade Commission, and to the Department of Justice. The President wanted the reaction of these three departments to the Darrow Review Board's report. He would publish it when it was all together. Last Monday morning there was released to the press the Darrow Review Board's report, and the only thing released with it was the response of N.R.A., the institution which was under investigation.

Is it fair to ask with some interest now, Where is the report that the Federal Trade Commission made to the President? Where is the report that the Department of Justice possibly made to the President in the face of the Darrow report? I feel inclined to say that it is fair to ask; and in a few days, if it shall develop that such reports are in existence, I shall offer a resolution here asking that the Senate be furnished with those reports.

I do not know how far I shall get with a resolution of that kind. I encountered the other day here in the Senate an example which indicates that probably I shall not get very far. I came into the Senate one day last week with a resolution asking that the Federal Trade Commission send to the Senate copies of the reports which the Federal Trade Commission had made to N.R.A. in response to requests of N.R.A. Not a voice was raised on the floor of the Senate in opposition to that resolution. Why should any voice be raised? But at a moment when there were but few in the Chamber on the following day a Member of this body rose in his place and moved reconsideration of that resolution, and it is on our calendar now.

Why is it that there is inclination to close the door on every hand to information which certainly the Members of Congress are entitled to and ought to have? Why can we not know the truth? If the Department of Justice in its antitrust division has found that the Darrow report is justified, why can we not know it? On the other hand, if the Department of Justice has found that the Darrow report was without good foundation, let us know that. If the Federal Trade Commission has reported to the President that the Darrow report was socialistic, communistic, and ought not to be seriously considered, let us know it. If the Federal Trade Commission has reported to the President that the Darrow report went to the heart of things and really developed facts that ought to have been developed, that, too, we ought to know. But no! There stand up men, when the call is made upon them, to object, to delay, to cover up; and the Senator who asked for reconsideration of that very simple, ordinary resolution of last week told me that he made the request because General Johnson had called him up and told him to hold it up.

Mr. President, I have talked now longer than I had planned to talk; but I give him warning that, without any desire to engage in filibuster, I shall probably be talking for a few minutes each and every day until at least there is forthcoming assurance that men who have proven themselves so deceptive shall not continue through this summer and fall with the power that they have abused so flagrantly in the past.

In closing my remarks, knowing that response will be made, and ought to be made, to what I have said, I desire to express the hope that words which I have not spoken shall not be placed in my mouth. I sincerely hope there will be none who will deny that I have tried most sincerely to cooperate in the N.R.A. cause. I have been thoroughly convinced, since the enactment of the recovery program, that N.R.A. had within it possibilities that could bring blessings to every home in America. I say yet that those possibilities exist, but never will they be produced so long as existing policies are pursued by those who are in charge.

My sympathy is entirely with what I understand to be the principle of N.R.A. I believe it accomplished splendid things when it did away with child labor, when it brought about shorter hours of employment, when it afforded a higher minimum-wage scale, when it eliminated here and there, as it has, some of the frightful, shameful methods of competition which business was resorting to in a cutthroat way to get some one else out of business, or to enhance and make brighter its own future.

Four years before legislation was enacted creating the N.R.A., I introduced in the Senate a so-called "fair trade bill", and in each subsequent session of Congress presented a similar bill. Extended hearings were held upon it in one session, but it never got beyond the subcommittee. That bill was wholly sympathetic to this program of codes, but the proposed legislation provided that the codes should be formulated with the Federal Trade Commission as guardian, as the representative of the Government, as the representative of the consumer, so that when a unit of industry came along and said, "We want a code", there would be a representative of the Government to pass upon the merit of the code which was being requested.

I believe sincerely in the need for the elimination of unfair practices. I believe in it because I have felt for long that small business was being eliminated by unfair trade practices resorted to by monopoly, and when N.R.A. came into being, I believed that N.R.A. would be so administered as to give the helping hand to small industries, not to monopoly. But when we see what is happening on every hand, and when we see the arrogant and defiant manner in which those under criticism stand up in hours like these, I am thoroughly convinced that nothing good will come out of N.R.A. until there shall be a complete shaking-up of the personnel of that organization, and until there shall be chosen men to carry on there whose sympathies are in accord with what I honestly believe to be the sympathies of the President of the United States.

The President has told me more than once of his interest and his sympathy in the cause of the small, independent business man. He believes he is a very important part of our economic structure. He has led me to believe that we ought to have more little ones and fewer big ones. Yet the policy under N.R.A. at every step thus far has been to make the big ones bigger and to make the little ones smaller and fewer in number.

Mr. President, I doubt very much whether under existing policies and leadership N.R.A. can do what I have always hoped would be accomplished under the law passed by Congress last March. It seems to me there is a thing which might be done by the Congress, or, better, by the President. We have the Darrow Reviewing Board finding that these codes are working to the aid of monopoly. There is the Federal Trade Commission finding that the codes are aiding monopoly and oppressing small business. So two agencies of the Government are found taking that view.

Within N.R.A. are two agencies, both created by General Johnson, the personnel of those agencies appointed by General Johnson. One is the Consumers' Advisory Council, the personnel of which is thoroughly displeased and demoralized by reason of the utter ignoring by General Johnson of its recommendations. Another one is the Planning and Coordinating Commission, I think it is called, within N.R.A., created by General Johnson, but as voiceless as it is possible to be.

There are four agencies of the Government with practically one view in common; namely, that the consumer is getting a very raw deal under some of these codes, and that monopoly is being more strongly entrenched than ever before.

Why would it not be to the advantage of Congress if it should summon the heads of those four boards before a duly constituted committee of the Congress to give testimony as to just what the trouble seems to be? Or, if Congress is not going to do it, what a fine advantage would flow if the President were to summon the heads of those four boards and informally discuss with them what might be done and what has happened in the past to prevent the right thing from being done. If that were to be done, N.R.A. would quickly discover, and the President would quickly discover, who its friends in this hour of great trial really are. I believe the President has such a plan in mind.

Mr. President, industrial recovery under the new deal was to be won through the breaking up and destruction of monopoly. Under N.R.A. monopoly has been more strongly entrenched than ever before.

N.R.A. was expected to accomplish more equitable division of industrial profits between capital and labor; instead, its administration has been such as to increase the profits of capital far beyond the increases won by labor, the consumer paying the larger costs without any material increase in buying power. This is well exemplified by the General Motors' report for 1933, to which I referred on yesterday, in which it is revealed that sales in dollars rose 31 percent, net earnings 50,000 percent, and average annual wages rose only three quarters of 1 percent.

Big business, proven selfish and greedy to a point that brought economic destruction under the old deal, is, under the N.R.A. program of self-regulation of industry, dominating in this self-regulation.

N.R.A. or any other recovery program is doomed to failure if its direction continues that of affording profit on the basis of watered, fictitious valuations and investments of the insane boom days; and when such effort is made without first restoring fully the boom-day buying power of labor and of the people of the United States generally, we invite a crash more complete and more lasting than even that of 1929 has proven.

If N.R.A. leaders were aiming, as did the Congress which supported the Recovery Act, at decentralization of industry and the accomplishment of a better day and chance for small industry, real recovery might now be well on its way. But instead, N.R.A. has been so abused and misdirected that the small fry in industry is fast finding itself devoured by the big fish, whose greed brought about our economic destruction from which we now seek recovery.

N.R.A. was supposed to save and put industry on its feet. If a census could be had at this time it would reveal business ventures now less by thousands than existed before the N.R.A. came into being.

Big business—our Schwabs and our Graces—evidently have learned no lesson from the depression. The purpose of big business remains that of controlling in its field, dominating at any cost its competition, and writing prices and costs which are all and more than the traffic, meaning the consumer, can possibly bear. Its domination of and cheering for N.R.A. are not a cheerful sign of what the future of N.R.A. has in store for the masses of the people.

The present promise of N.R.A. reforms must, of necessity, as I have said, be weighed alongside of the unfulfilled promises of reforms made by the same crack-down artists during these many months of N.R.A. activity.

The regimenting of industry and business by the Government through N.R.A., and the turning over of this regimentation to big business, which dominates the code authorities, which, in turn, are to lead in the self-regulation of industry, is nothing more than the old deal thrown into high gear.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that the continuation of existing N.R.A. policies, under existing leadership and direction, is bound to carry us to more economic havoc than we have yet known, regardless of how many more Army officers may be called to the side of the present Administrator to assist him. All the Army officers on the Federal pay roll are not going to be able to stuff the public much longer with this ballyhoo giving N.R.A. the credit for what C.W.A., C.C.C., P.W.A., natural recovery, and Uncle Sam's purse and credit have done.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD the decision handed down by Judge Charles I. Dawson, United States district judge for the western district of Kentucky, in the case of Hart Coal Corporation et al. against Thomas J. Sparks et al., which case involved the code of fair competition for the bituminous coal-mining industry in western Kentucky.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY

HART COAL CORPORATION ET AL., PLAINTIFFS, v. THOMAS J. SPARKS, UNITED STATES ATTORNEY FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY, AND J. R. LAYMAN, STATE COMPLIANCE DIRECTOR OF KENTUCKY, DEFENDANTS

Opinion

The plaintiffs seek in this section to enjoin Thomas J. Sparks, United States attorney for the western district of Kentucky, and J. R. Layman, State compliance director of Kentucky, appointed under the National Industrial Recovery Act, from initiating or prosecuting any suit or suits in equity or any criminal proceedings against them for violations of a certain order issued by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, Administrator for National Recovery, on March 31, 1934, as supplemented by an order issued by said Johnson on April 22, 1934, these orders having been issued as amendments to and supplements of the code of fair competition for the bituminous coal industry, approved and recommended by said Johnson, Administrator, etc., and promulgated by the President on September 18, 1933. On application for a temporary restraining order the action was dismissed as to the defendant, J. R. Layman, State compliance director, it affirmatively appearing that he has no authority to direct, institute, or control any proceeding, civil or criminal, against violators of the code. A temporary restraining order was granted, enjoining the defendant, Sparks, as United States attorney, pending further order of the court, from initiating any prosecution or other action to enforce the penalties attempted to be authorized by the National Recovery Act for violations of codes promulgated under its terms. The matter is now before me on motion for a preliminary injunction against the United States attorney.

The 34 plaintiffs are engaged in bituminous-coal mining in the western Kentucky coal field, and they produce approximately 90 percent of all the coal produced in that field.

The bill alleges that notwithstanding the fact that the mining and production of coal for market is not interstate commerce, and that Congress has no power to regulate same, many of the plaintiffs joined in submitting to the President for his approval a code of fair competition for the bituminous-coal-mining industry in western Kentucky; that the western Kentucky mining field has for many years been a sharply defined subdivision of the coal industry, having peculiar and exceptional problems not existing in other competitive coal-mining areas; that by reason of the relative thinness of the coal seams and the resulting high per-ton cost of production, and because of high freight-rate differentials against the field, this field must be regarded as a separate and distinct unit in the coal-producing industry; that in the code submitted by this field these exceptionally adverse conditions were given recognition in the wage scale which it proposed, but that this code was rejected and a so-called "national code" for the bituminous-coal industry, providing for much higher minimum wages, was formulated by the said Johnson, Administrator, and approved by the President.

It is further alleged that notwithstanding many of the provisions of the so-called "national code", and particularly the minimum-wage scales therein prescribed, were wholly unacceptable to the plaintiffs and other producers in western Kentucky, they yielded obedience to and proceeded to operate under it, relying upon certain clauses of the code providing for a readjustment of minimum wages and hours of service after investigation of these matters in the manner provided for in the code; that as a result of the investigation conducted by the code authorities as to the matter of wages, hours, and freight differentials, it was disclosed that for the month of November 1933, the western Kentucky coal field, operating under the wages fixed in the national code, had sustained a loss of 6.95 cents per ton on coal produced, while their competitors in the southern Illinois field for the same period had made a profit of 10.52 cents per ton, and in the Indiana field, of 7.76 cents per ton; that thereupon the representatives of the western Kentucky operators requested of the Administrator a readjustment of the wage scale in western Kentucky, but that no action was taken upon this request until March 31, 1934, when General Johnson, Administrator, without notice or hearing, arbitrarily and in disregard of the facts, issued one of the orders complained of herein, by which the minimum-wage scale for the western Kentucky field and certain other fields, including Alabama, as fixed in the original code, was greatly increased and the hours of service reduced from 8 to 7 hours per day, with no corresponding increases in the fields of Illinois and Indiana, except such increases as resulted from changing the hours of service from 8 to 7 hours per day; that thereupon the plaintiffs, knowing that they could not operate under the increased wage scale except at a heavy loss, reduced the operations of their mines to the minimum necessary to fill existing contracts, and proceeded to Washington for a hearing on the order, which was had on April 9, 1934; that at this hearing, in support of their claim that they could not live under the wages prescribed, they offered figures compiled and findings made by the National Recovery Administration itself, and that no evidence to the contrary was offered or heard by the National Recovery Administration; that at this hearing the representative of General Johnson, Administrator, conducting the hearing, was asked if there was any other evidence in possession of the Administrator bearing upon the ability of the western Kentucky field to operate without a loss under the prescribed wages, and that they were advised that there was no such other evidence; that notwithstanding these facts, the said Johnson, as Administrator, on April 22, 1934, issued the second order complained of, declining to reduce the wage scale for the western Kentucky field, as fixed in his order of March 31, 1934, but materially reducing it for the Alabama field, which is a competitor of the western Kentucky field in southern markets; that this reduction of the Alabama wage scale, without a corresponding reduction in the western Kentucky field, inevitably operates to close to the plaintiffs those markets in the South in which Alabama coal is a competitor, and that the combined effect of the two orders of March 31 and April 22 is to practically exclude them from all competitive markets, North and South, and to destroy their business.

The orders complained of are attacked as an unconstitutional attempt on the part of the National Government to regulate matters exclusively reserved to the States and to the people under the tenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, and as violative of the fifth amendment to the Constitution in that it deprives the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law. It is further claimed that, conceding the power of Congress to regulate hours of service and wages in coal mines, the National Recovery Act is unconstitutional because of an unlawful delegation of legislative power; that, conceding the validity of the act, the orders complained of are arbitrary and capricious, and made in disregard of the provisions of the code of fair competition for the bituminous-coal industry and of the facts developed under the terms of that code.

The answer of the defendant, in addition to denying many of the allegations of the bill, portrays coal mining as a great national industry and the importance of the product of such mines to many of the basic industries of the country located in States other than those in which the coal is produced, and to the railroads, carrying a large part of the interstate commerce of the country, and claims for Congress the power to regulate and foster the industry as one affecting interstate commerce, and the affidavit of Wayne P. Ellis was offered in support of this theory.

At the threshold of the case I am met with the suggestion that the plaintiffs are in no position to seek equitable relief: First, because they have an adequate remedy at law; and, second, because by operating under the terms of the code promulgated under the National Recovery Act and accepting its benefits they are precluded from attacking the constitutionality of the act and of the orders complained of, purporting to have been issued under its authority.

In view of the heavy penalties provided in the act for violating codes of fair competition promulgated under it, there can be no doubt, under well-settled equity principles, of the inadequacy of the remedy at law.

I think the suggestion that the plaintiffs are estopped by their alleged previous acceptance of and operation under the code to question the constitutionality of the orders complained of, and of the act as construed by those charged with its enforcement, is pressing the doctrines of estoppel and waiver to an unreasonable limit; and in fairness to the district attorney and his counsel it should be stated that this contention has not been very vigorously urged. The court must be presumed to know what is common knowledge. The authorities charged with the enforcement of the National Recovery Act have proclaimed from the date of its passage that the codes promulgated under it are the law of the land and binding upon every person in the industry affected, whether they consent to same or not; and that upon a violation of such codes the dire penalties fixed in the act would be imposed upon them. No opportunity of election was presented. Not only this, but they were threatened with boycotts and blacklisting if they dared to operate in disregard of the terms of the code applicable to their particular industry. It seems to me that in view of this well-known and publicly proclaimed attitude of the authorities the Government is in a poor position to contend that its citizens operating under the codes are precluded from questioning the constitutional authority of those who seek to enforce them.

Furthermore, it is pleaded and not denied that these plaintiffs had nothing to do with fixing the terms of the code here involved; that they merely acquiesced in and operated under it after it was promulgated, as the national authorities were insisting they were legally compelled to do. To treat their past acquiescence and compliance with its terms under these conditions as voluntary and as an election to operate under it would be not unlike treating the unresisting march of the condemned criminal to the gallows as his consent to his own execution.

The right claimed for the President and his subordinates under the act to regulate hours of service and wages in coal mines either is, or is not, authorized under the Constitution, and those charged with the enforcement of the act, and claiming authority under it, should not desire nor will they be permitted, under the specious plea of estoppel or waiver, to evade a judicial determination of this important question.

Section 1 of the act reads:

"A national emergency productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people, is hereby declared to exist. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof; and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries, to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required), to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources."

Section 3 (a) authorizes the President, upon application to him by one or more trade or industrial associations or groups, to approve voluntary codes of fair competition for such trades or industries as are represented by the applicants, provided certain conditions and requirements of the statute are met.

Section 3 (b) provides:

"After the President shall have approved any such code the provisions of such code shall be the standards of fair competition for such trade or industry or subdivision thereof. Any violation of such standards in any transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed an unfair method of competition in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended; but nothing in this title shall be construed to impair the powers of the Federal Trade Commission under such act as amended."

Section 3 (d) provides:

"Upon his own motion, or if complaint is made to the President that abuses inimical to the public interest and contrary to the policy herein declared are prevalent in any trade or industry or subdivision thereof, and if no code of fair competition therefor has theretofore been approved by the President, the President, after such public notice and hearing as he shall specify, may prescribe and approve a code of fair competition for such trade or industry or subdivision thereof, which shall have the same effect as a code of fair competition approved by the President under subsection (a) of this section."

Section 3 (f) provides that when a voluntary code of fair competition has been approved by the President, as authorized by section 3 (a), or when such a code has been prescribed by the President under section 3 (d)—

"Any violation of any provision thereof in any transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof an offender shall be fined not more than $500 for each offense, and each day such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

Section 4 reads:

"(a) The President is authorized to enter into agreements with, and to approve voluntary agreements between and among persons engaged in a trade or industry, labor organizations, and trade or industrial organizations, associations, or groups relating to any trade or industry, if in his judgment, such agreements will aid in effectuating the policy of this title with respect to transactions in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce, and will be consistent with the requirements of clause (2) of subsection (a) of section 3 for a code of fair competition.

"(b) Whenever the President shall find that destructive wage or price cutting or other activities contrary to the policy of this title are being practiced in any trade or industry or any subdivision thereof, and, after such public notice and hearing as he shall specify, shall find it essential to license business enterprises in order to make effective a code of fair competition or an agreement under this title or otherwise to effectuate the policy of this title, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in such announcement, engage in or carry on any business, in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce, specified in such announcement, unless he shall have first obtained a license issued pursuant to such regulations as the President shall prescribe. The President may suspend or revoke any such license, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, for violations of the terms or conditions thereof. Any order of the President suspending or revoking any such license shall be final if in accordance with law. Any person who, without such a license, or in violation of any condition thereof, carries on any such business for which a license is so required, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, and each day such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 2 (c), this subsection shall cease to be in effect at the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act or sooner if the President shall by proclamation or the Congress shall by joint resolution declare that the emergency recognized by section 1 has ended."

The foregoing provisions of the act make it perfectly apparent that Congress relied upon the commerce clause of the Constitution to justify the legislation. The declaration of policy contained in section 1 clearly proclaims this, and the penalties provided in the act for violations of its terms and for violation of the codes promulgated under it are carefully restricted to transactions in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce, and section 7 (d) defines interstate and foreign commerce as follows:

"The terms 'interstate and foreign commerce' and 'interstate or foreign commerce' include, except where otherwise indicated, trade or commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State, Territory, or foreign nation, or between any insular possessions or other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, or between any such possession or place and any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or any foreign nation, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States."

Under well-settled rules of statutory construction, the language of this act should be construed by the courts according to the commonly accepted and understood meaning of the words used. In the light of this rule, and indulging the presumption that Congress was familiar with the well-understood limits of its powers under the commerce clause as determined by the Supreme Court, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the act was drawn with full appreciation of the limitations upon the powers of Congress under the commerce clause and with no intention of exceeding these powers; or was deliberately dressed in constitutional language to conceal a purpose to exercise a degree of regulation not within the fair intendment of the language used; or else those charged with the enforcement of the act have construed it to authorize the regulation of matters not intended by Congress to be regulated.

The second alternative I unhesitatingly reject. The question of whether those charged with the enforcement of the Recovery Act are misconstruing it in their attempt to regulate the production and preparation of coal for market is not material. The real question is: Does the act, as so construed, transcend the constitutional power of Congress?

In considering this question we must never forget that the National Government is one of delegated powers, and that Congress possesses only such legislative powers as are expressly or by implication conferred upon it by the people in the Constitution. Even though the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution had never been adopted, it would be difficult, in the light of the history of the Constitution, of its source, and of the objects sought to be accomplished by it, to reach any other conclusion than that there is reserved to the States or to the people all the powers and rights not expressly or impliedly conferred upon the National Government. But the ninth amendment, which declares—

"The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or to disparage others retained by the people"— and the tenth amendment, providing that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people"— put this matter beyond all question. Therefore, Congress does not have all legislative power. It possesses only such legislative power as has been expressly or impliedly conferred upon it.

By clause 3, section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, Congress is given the power—

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

It is to be noted that the power vested in Congress by this clause is not the power to regulate every activity of the people. It does not grant the power even to regulate all commerce; it must be interstate or foreign commerce, embracing within that power, of course, the power to regulate such acts and transactions as, within constitutional limitations, can be reasonably deemed to directly affect interstate commerce. Interstate commerce cannot constitutionally be stretched to reach those activities not embraced within the meaning of the word commerce. "Commerce" has been defined by Webster as intercourse, especially the exchange or the buying and selling of commodities; trade or traffic; and, of course, includes the movements necessary to such intercourse, trade or traffic, and the instrumentalities of such movements, but it does not include production or manufacture of articles of commerce.

In the case of McCall v. California (136 U.S. 106), the following definition of commerce, given by Pomeroy in his work on Constitutional Law, is approved:

"It includes the fact of intercourse and of traffic and the subject matter of intercourse and traffic. The fact of intercourse and traffic, again, embraces all the means, instruments, and places by and in which intercourse and traffic are carried on, and, further still, comprehends the act of carrying them on at these places and by and with these means. The subject matter of intercourse or traffic may be either things, goods, chattels, merchandise, or persons."

Since Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1) the Supreme Court has been called upon innumerable times, not only to define what is interstate commerce within the regulatory power of Congress but also what is not interstate commerce, and these opinions graphically portray the scope which has been given to the commerce clause, in order that national authority may be fully and completely exercised over this matter of national concern, yet without invading the rights reserved to the States and the people under the tenth amendment. They have been but the logical development, under the particular facts involved, of the definition of interstate commerce given in Hopkins v. United States (171 U.S. 578):

"Definitions as to what constitutes interstate commerce are not easily given so that they shall clearly define the full meaning of the term. We know from the cases decided in this court that it is a term of very large significance. It comprehends, as it is said, intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of different States, and the power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted."

Cases illustrating the scope of the power are: Montague & Co. v. Lowry (193 U.S. 38); Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States (175 U.S. 211); Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U.S. 375); Lemke v. Farmers' Grain Co. (258 U.S. 50); Stafford v. Wallace (258 U.S. 495); Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U.S. 1); Dahnke-Walker Milling Co. v. Bondurant (257 U.S. 282); Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers of America (268 U.S. 295); United States v. Ferger (250 U.S. 199); United States v. Patten (226 U.S. 525); Railroad Commission of Wisconsin v. C., B. & Q. R.R. Co. (257 U.S. 563); Houston, East & West Texas Railway Co. v. United States (234 U.S. 342). But in no case has the Supreme Court ever decided, or even hinted, that the power to regulate interstate commerce, or transactions affecting interstate commerce, embraces the power to regulate the production and manufacture of articles intended for commerce. On the contrary, that court has been at pains to point out that these activities are exclusively within the control of the States, or reserved to the people.

In the case of United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U.S., p. 1), the Court said:

"Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not the primary sense; and although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it. * * *

"It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power, and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk to be run in the effort to suppress them of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality. * * *

"The regulation of commerce applies to the subjects of commerce and not to matters of internal police. Contracts to buy, sell, or exchange goods to be transported among the several States, the transportation and its instrumentalities, and articles bought, sold, or exchanged for the purposes of such transit among the States, or put in the way of transit, may be regulated, but this is because they form part of interstate trade or commerce. The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and belongs to commerce."

In the case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U.S., p. 1), which was dealing with the constitutionality, under the commerce clause, of a State law which prohibited the manufacture therein of liquor even for shipment out of the State, the court said:

"No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation, at least, of such transportation. The legal definition of the term as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U.S. 691–702), is as follows: 'Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities.' If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufactures but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

"It is not necessary to enlarge on, but only to suggest the impracticability of such a scheme, when we regard the multitudinous affairs involved, and the almost infinite variety of their minute details. * * *

"The demands of such a supervision would require, not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question."

In the case of Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R.R. Co. v. Yurkonis (238 U.S. 439), there was involved the question of whether Yurkonis, who was injured while working in a coal mine belonging to the railroad company, the coal from which was to be used by the railroad company in the operation of its interstate trains, was engaged in interstate commerce at the time he was injured so as to bring him under the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act. The court held that the mining of coal was not commerce, and the fact that it was being mined for use in the operation of trains in interstate movements did not bring such mining under the control of the national Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

In Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co. (260 U.S. 245), there was involved the constitutionality under the commerce clause of a Pennsylvania statute taxing anthracite coal when prepared and ready for shipment or market. The act was attacked on the ground that the tax was a burden on interstate commerce, the argument being that Pennsylvania had a virtual monopoly in anthracite coal; that the major part of the production finds its market in other States, and that the necessary and intended result of the law was to pass this tax on to the citizens of other States, and thus burden interstate commerce. The case was most carefully considered, the attorneys general of nine different States in which Pennsylvania anthracite coal finds a market appearing in the Supreme Court to urge its unconstitutionality because it burdened interstate commerce. In response to this contention, the Court said:

"The reach and consequences of the contention repel its acceptance. If the possibility, or, indeed, certainty of exportation of a product or article from a State determines it to be in interstate commerce before the commencement of its movement from the State, it would seem to follow that it is in such commerce from the instant of its growth or production, and in the case of coals, as they lie in the ground. The result would be curious. It would nationalize all industries, it would nationalize and withdraw from State jurisdiction and deliver to Federal commercial control the fruits of California and the South, the wheat of the West and its meats, the cotton of the South, the shoes of Massachusetts and the woolen industries of other States, at the very inception of their production or growth; that is, the fruits unpicked, the cotton and wheat ungathered, hides and flesh of cattle yet on the hoof, wool yet unshorn, and coal yet unmined, because they are in varying percentages destined for and surely to be exported to States other than those of their production.

"However, we need not proceed further in speculation and argument. Ingenuity and imagination have been exercised heretofore upon a like contention. There is temptation to it in the relation of the States to the Federal Government, being yet superior to the States in instances, or rather, having spheres of action exclusive of them."

Oliver Iron Co. v. Lord (262 U.S. 172) involved the constitutionality under the commerce clause of a Minnesota statute, imposing a tax on the business of mining iron ore equal to 6 per cent of the value of the ore produced. It was claimed that inasmuch as substantially all the ore produced was mined with the expectation that it would be, and actually was, immediately loaded on cars and shipped into other States to satisfy existing contracts, the mining of the ore constituted interstate commerce, and the imposition of a tax on such mining was a burden upon such commerce. In response to this contention, the Court said:

"Plainly the facts do not support the contention. Mining is not interstate commerce, but, like manufacturing, is a local business subject to local regulation and taxation. * * * Its character in this regard is intrinsic, is not affected by the intended use or disposal of the product, is not controlled by contractual engagements, and persists even though the business be conducted in close connection with interstate commerce."

Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U.S. 251) involved the constitutionality under the commerce clause of the act of Congress of September 1, 1916, prohibiting transportation in interstate commerce of goods made in any factory employing certain kinds of child labor. The court held that the regulation of the business of manufacturing was beyond the reach of Congress under the commerce clause, and in discussing the proposition, said:

"Commerce consists of intercourse and traffic, and includes the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. The making of goods and the mining of coal are not commerce, nor does the fact that these things are to be afterward shipped or used in interstate commerce make their production a part thereof. * * * Over interstate transportation or its incidents the regulatory power of Congress is ample, but the production of articles intended for interstate commerce is a matter of local regulation. * * * If it were otherwise, all manufacture intended for interstate shipment would be brought under Federal control to the practical exclusion of the authority of the States, a result certainly not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution when they vested in Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the States. It is further contended that the authority of Congress may be exerted to control interstate commerce in the shipment of child-made goods because of the effect of the circulation of such goods in other States, where the evil of this class of labor has been recognized by local legislation, and the right to thus employ child labor has been more rigorously restrained than in the State of production. In other words, that the unfair competition thus engendered may be controlled by closing the channels of interstate commerce to manufacturers in those States where the local laws do not meet what Congress deems to be the more just standard of other States. There is no power vested in Congress to require the States to exercise their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition. Many causes may cooperate to give one State, by reason of local laws or conditions, an economic advantage over others. The commerce clause was not intended to give to Congress a general authority to equalize such conditions. In some of the States laws have been passed fixing minimum wages for women; in others, the local law regulates the hours of labor of women in various employments. Business done in such States may be at an economic disadvantage when compared with States which have no such regulation; surely this fact does not give Congress the power to deny transportation in interstate commerce to those who carry on business where the hours of labor and the rate of compensation for women have not been fixed by a standard in use in other States and approved by Congress. The grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce, and not to give it authority to control the States in their exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture. The grant of authority over a purely Federal matter was not intended to destroy the local power always existing and carefully reserved to the States in the tenth amendment to the Constitution."

It was held in Crescent Cotton Oil Co. v. Mississippi (257 U.S. 129), that the separation of the seed from the fiber of cotton, through the use of a cotton gin, was a part of the manufacture of both the seed and fiber into useful articles of commerce, and the fact that these articles while in process of manufacture were intended for export to another State did not make such ginning interstate commerce.

In Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost (286 U.S. 165), it was held that the generation of electricity from water power, and the transmission of the current over wires from the generator to consumers in another State, are two entirely separate and distinct operations, one a local manufacturing operation, subject to exclusive State control, and the other interstate commerce. The court said:

"We are satisfied, upon a consideration of the whole case, that the process of generation is as essentially local as though electrical energy were a physical thing; and to that situation we must apply, as controlling, the general rule that commerce does not begin until manufacture is finished, and hence the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prevent the State from exercising exclusive control over the manufacture. Cornell v. Coyne (192 U.S. 418, 428–429). 'Commerce succeeds to manufacture and is not a part of it.' United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U.S. 1, 12).

"Without regard to the apparent continuity of the movement, appellant, in effect, is engaged in two activities, not in one only. So far as it produces electrical energy in Idaho, its business is purely intrastate, subject to State taxation and control. In transmitting the product across the State line into Utah, appellant is engaged in interstate commerce, and State legislation in respect thereof is subject to the paramount authority of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution."

In United Mine Workers of America v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U.S. 344), the Supreme Court again declared:

"Coal mining is not interstate commerce, and the power of Congress does not extend to its regulation as such."

And the force of this decision is not at all weakened by the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers of America (268 U.S. 295), for there the Court simply held that on the second trial of the case in the lower court the evidence showed that there was a conspiracy to directly interfere with and obstruct interstate commerce.

In the very recent case of Chassaniol v. City of Greenwood, decided March 12, 1934, Mr. Justice Brandeis, writing for the Court, again emphasized the fact that manufacturing processes and acts directly in connection therewith do not constitute interstate commerce, even though the product manufactured is intended for sale and shipment in interstate commerce.

Cases emphasizing the lack of power in the National Government, under the commerce clause, to regulate manufacture and production could be multiplied; but to refer to them would unnecessarily extend this opinion. Indeed, it seems to me that the lack of such power is as axiomatic as is the proposition that no State is entitled to more than two Senators under the Constitution. He who would find in such cases as Stafford v. Wallace and Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen, supra, authority for the exercise of such power, has read the opinions of the Supreme Court on the subject to but little purpose, and fails to comprehend that those cases dealt with acts, instrumentalities, and agencies directly connected with and affecting interstate commerce, and in no wise involve the regulation of manufacture or production.

As the defendant seeks to justify the orders here involved solely under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and as the act plainly indicates that Congress found its justification under that clause, I should probably be justified in testing the constitutionality of these orders under that clause alone; but the matter is of such grave importance, and courts are so reluctant to strike down as unconstitutional acts of coordinate departments of the Government, that I feel constrained to search further to determine if justification can be found for the orders involved in any other provision of the fundamental law. Frankly, I would be at a loss to conjecture under what other provision or provisions of the Constitution those who claim for the National Government the right to regulate manufacture and production would, in good faith, profess to find such authority but for the arguments advanced from time to time by those who defend the exercise of this authority. Generally speaking, aside from the commerce clause, the act, as construed by those charged with its enforcement, has been defended as a proper exercise of national power in a great emergency; or as an exercise of the inherent power of the National Government to accomplish the purposes set forth in the preamble of the Constitution, and some have thought that it could be justified by clause 1, section 8, article I, of the Constitution, which vests in Congress the power—

"To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Certainly no emergency, no matter how pressing, can clothe Congress with any power to legislate on matters not expressly or impliedly confided to it by the Constitution.

In the great case of Ex parte Milligan (4 Wall. 2), the Supreme Court exploded the doctrine that emergency creates national power in the following language:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence; as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

In Wilson v. New (243 U.S. 332), the Supreme Court again held that a national emergency could not be made the source of congressional power; that it could not call into existence a power not granted in the Constitution. And again, in the very recent case of Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell (290 U.S. 398), the Supreme Court, through Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, was careful to explain that while emergency may afford a reason for the exertion of admitted legislative power, it cannot call into life a power which has never existed.

The so-called "rent cases", Block v. Hirsh (256 U.S. 135); Brown Holding Co. v. Feldman (256 U.S. 170); Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel (258 U.S. 242), and the more recent cases of Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell (290 U.S. 398), and Nebbia v. New York, decided by the Supreme Court on March 5, 1934, have been thought by many to afford support for the emergency doctrine; but this conception of these cases is erroneous.

The case of Block v. Hirsh, supra, involved the extent to which the police power of Congress over the District of Columbia may be exercised in an emergency; and Brown Holding Co. v. Feldman and Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel, supra, involved the extent of the exercise of the police power of the State of New York in an emergency. The same question was involved in the Minnesota case of Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell and the New York case of Nebbia v. New York, supra.

In considering these cases it is important to keep in mind that the National Government has no police power, as that term is generally understood, within the boundaries of sovereign States, except over property therein owned by the Government in its proprietary capacity. It does possess such police power over the District of Columbia by virtue of clause 17, section 8, article I, of the Constitution, which authorized Congress—

"* * * to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and acceptance of Congress, become the seat of government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

This provision of the Constitution vests in Congress all legislative power over the District of Columbia, and such power, of course, includes the general police power inherent in governments possessing unrestricted legislative authority. So in the District of Columbia rent case the Supreme Court found that the underlying power necessary to sustain the legislation was the police power conferred by the Constitution over the District, and that the emergency simply justified the exercise of this admitted existing power to an extent which would not be tolerated in normal times.

The only police power possessed by Congress other than that heretofore noted is over the Territories and public domain of the United States; and the authority for the exercise of the police power in this field is found in clause 2, section 3, article IV, of the Constitution, which provides:

"The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

The generally recognized power of Congress to define certain acts as crimes, and fix the punishment therefor, does not rest upon the police power proper, but upon the expressly or impliedly granted powers of the National Government, and upon that provision of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the power to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution the enumerated powers of the National Government. Thus, Congress under the commerce clause has the power to define offenses against such commerce and fix the punishment therefor, and the same is true with reference to the other powers expressly or impliedly conferred upon the National Government. But this is a very different thing from the police power which embraces the right to legislate for the general welfare, health, and safety of the community. This is the highest power possessed by a government having unrestricted legislative authority. Granted a reasonable basis for its exercise, it acknowledges few, if any, limitations in such a government; but, with the exceptions heretofore noted, it is not possessed by the Government of the United States, except to the extent that it exists in connection with the exercise of its delegated powers. See The Lottery Cases (188 U.S. 321); Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States (220 U.S. 45); Caminetti v. United States (242 U.S. 470).

It would hardly seem necessary to demonstrate the fallacy of the claim that there is any inherent or general power unmentioned in the Constitution to accomplish the purposes set forth in the preamble to that instrument. It would seem perfectly apparent that the objects set forth in the preamble were intended by the fathers to be attained through the exercise of the powers granted to the National Government in the Constitution; otherwise, the National Government is not one of limited delegated powers, but of unlimited powers, with Congress free to accomplish the purposes set out in the preamble in whatever way may appeal to the judgment of that body. Of course, the statement of this proposition carries with it its own refutation.

The present, however, is not the first time that the argument has been advanced that the preamble contains an affirmative grant of power. Such a contention was advanced in Jacobson v. Masachusetts (197 U.S. 11), and Mr. Justice Harlan, for the Court, disposed of this contention in this language:

"We pass without extended discussion the suggestion that the particular section of the statute of Massachusetts now in question is in derogation of rights secured by the preamble of the Constitution of the United States. Although that preamble indicates the general purposes for which the people ordained and established the Constitution, it has never been regarded as the source of any substantive power conferred on the Government of the United States or on any of its departments. Such powers embrace only those expressly granted in the body of the Constitution and such as may be implied from those so granted. Although, therefore, one of the declared objects of the Constitution was to secure the blessings of liberty to all under the sovereign jurisdiction and authority of the United States, no power can be exerted to that end by the United States, unless, apart from the preamble, it be found in some express delegation of power or in some power to be properly implied therefrom."

Clause 1, section 8, article I, of the Constitution, which vests Congress with the power to lay and collect taxes, etc., is so punctuated that, if considered by itself, it might be construed as conferring two separate and distinct powers upon Congress—one to lay and collect taxes, and the other to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. Of course, if such construction were given to this section, it would wipe out all limitations upon the powers of Congress and leave it with unlimited power to legislate for the general welfare of the United States. The inevitable result compels a rejection of such a construction.

Story, in his work on Constitutional Law, after a careful consideration of the clause, reached the conclusion that it should be construed as if it literally read to empower Congress to pay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, and this construction was approved in United States v. Boyer (85 Fed. 425) and has never been questioned by any court of reputable authority.

So far as I am advised, the only contention that there is any other constitutional provision supporting the power here claimed is the suggestion, which has been rather tentatively advanced by the general counsel for the National Recovery Administration, that the authority is implicit in clause 5, section 8, of article I, which empowers Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof. It is suggested that the Federal Government would be acting within its delegated powers under this clause in relating the value of money to the wages of labor, and could thus bring within national control the wages and hours of service in every industry in the country. I am quite satisfied that no reputable court would so construe that provision of the Constitution, and the suggestion only serves to illustrate the straits to which those are driven who would sustain the National Recovery Act as construed by its enforcers.

The scheme of regulation of the strictly local affairs of the citizens of the country, attempted to be set up and enforced under the Recovery Act, has no place in our system of government, and it is futile for its defenders to attempt to justify it on constitutional grounds. No such justification can be found. It is the boldest kind of usurpation—dared by the authorities and tolerated by the public only because of the bewilderment of the people in the present emergency. Every person at all familiar with the Constitution and our scheme of government under it knows that no such power exists, and its mere academic assertion would be amusing, but its determined exercise is tragic. In the exercise of this claimed power the national authorities have reached out and by codes and other regulations are attempting to regulate every conceivable character of local business—the tailor in his shop, the merchant in his store, the blacksmith at his forge, the coal operator, and the manufacturer. Apparently, none of the activities of man are acknowledged as beyond its reach. If the existence of such a power in the National Government be admitted, it means the end of constitutional government in this country, under which individual effort and initiative have been fostered and encouraged, and the people generally have enjoyed a degree of liberty of person and security of property unknown to the rest of the world. I know of no higher duty of the national courts, the judges of which are sworn to support and defend the Constitution of the United States, than to strike down such an unwarranted invasion of the reserved powers of the States and the rights of the people.

In view of my conclusions on the fundamental question of the power of Congress to regulate the matters dealt within the orders complained of, there is no occasion to consider the other objections urged against the validity of these orders, and I shall not do so except to observe that, conceding such power, the act would be an unconstitutional delegation of that power to the President, as it sets up no standards to guide him in carrying out the legislative policy and will expressed in the act (United States v. Grimaud (220 U.S. 506); Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich Transit Co. (224 U.S. 194); Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U.S. 394)).

A preliminary injunction, enjoining the defendant, Sparks, as United States Attorney, from initiating any prosecution or other action to enforce the penalties attempted to be authorized by the National Industrial Recovery Act for violations by the plaintiffs, or any of them, of the orders of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, National Administrator, dated March 31, 1934, and the amended and modified order of said Johnson, as National Administrator, dated April 22, 1934, both of same purporting to be amendments to and supplements of the code of fair competition for the bituminous coal industry, attempted to be promulgated under the provisions of the National Recovery Act, is granted.

I see no occasion at this time for making the preliminary injunction any broader in its scope than here indicated.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, 12 months ago I addressed the Senate in behalf of an untested program for the relief of the American people. Today it may be appropriate for me to survey the achievements and restate the philosophy of that program at a time when it is being subjected to examination and appraisal by the Senate and by other agencies.

The "new deal" has accomplished too much to fear destruction by its enemies. It can suffer only if its friends clothe it in perfection and scorn the advocates of improvement. In any program of action, some mistakes are made, some fine opportunities are overlooked, some weaknesses are disclosed, and some good instrumentalities are perverted to serve ignoble ends. We are embarked upon a program of action, and nothing could be more valuable to the American people than criticism that is developed thoughtfully and advanced temperately. Such criticism is abundant at the present time, and there is no greater need than that it should be sifted and weighed carefully and impartially.

It is not my purpose at this time to review the progress of the public-employment measures, such as the Public Works and Civil Works Administrations. They have been more than vindicated. They have performed useful work, given impetus to private industry, and rescued 5,000,000 workers and their families from ruin. No longer can there be doubt that the Government should serve as a balance wheel to mitigate the violence of the business cycle.

At the very core of our program for economic reconstruction is the National Industrial Recovery Act, for the ultimate test which we must face is the capacity of a revived industrial system to operate more continuously and more justly than it has in the past, and to absorb about 9,000,000 people who are now unemployed.

The Recovery Act has yielded favorable results, although the road to be traveled is yet a long one. Over 4,000,000 people have been reabsorbed by private industry, of whom 1,000,000 have been taken on since January 1, and the index of employment is 37 percent higher than a year ago. No recovery in the history of business cycles has been so rapid, and conditions today are better than at any time since December 1930. Current improvements are particularly significant, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, because there is generally a regression during this time of year.

The expansion of industry has been accompanied by a vast improvement in the conditions under which men and women earn their bread. Hours of labor have been reduced 16 per cent. This gain is much more striking when we deal with specific cases rather than with averages. And in hours of work it is the special cases at the long, wearing end of the scale that take the heavy human toll. The full-time week in the manufacture of silk and rayon goods was 54½ hours in 1914. In March 1933 it had dropped only to 51. Under the code the maximum is set at 40, and thus is achieved overnight a gain three times as great as had been attained in 9 years. The full week for laborers in the steel industry was 54 hours a year ago; it is now 40. Examples might be multiplied endlessly.

With the abolition of the sweatshop has come the outlawing of child labor. For half a century statesmanship and education and philanthropy grappled with this social disease in vain. Yet almost spontaneously practically every code has forbidden the employment of children under 16 years of age. That this has been accomplished by the combined efforts of the administration, labor, and industry, without any express mandate in the law, should be the complete answer to those who doubted the flexibility of the law.

Wage reform is the keynote of the Recovery Act. The failure in the past to allocate a large enough share of the national income to employees dried up consumer purchasing power and made collapse inevitable. Under the new deal wages have spiraled upward with great rapidity. The index of factory pay rolls, which stood at 38 a year ago, has risen to 67, representing an astounding gain of over 73 percent and touching the highest peak of the past 3 years.

With wages, as with hours of labor, average gains are less spectacular than the relief brought to special groups which had been forced to live on the fringe of destitution. Innumerable code investigations disclosed and removed conditions so shameful that they could not continue to exist under the pitiless rays of publicity.

For example, in one type of job in a particular industry the number of hours actually worked per week averaged 55, for which the compensation was $9.58. In another the average weekly compensation for women was $7.70. In both of these instances, as in many others, the minimum week under the code is 40 hours and the minimum pay from $13 to $14.

A fully functioning productive mechanism is the basis for any prosperous economic order. The index of basic industrial output is 34 percent above what it was a year ago, and half of this progress has come during the past 6 months. The ground lost between the beginning of 1931 and the early part of 1933 has been recaptured. Other tokens of business progress are at hand. Freight-car loadings during recent months have reached a volume unequaled during the past 2 years. Accumulated stocks are being disposed of. Residential construction is now at its highest during a 2-year period. Monthly brokers' loans are twice as voluminous as a year ago. The automobile industry is in exceptionally good shape, while electric-power production and the steel and coal operations are advancing.

Faced with unimpeachable evidence that we have restored the shattered hopes of the American people in the short space of 1 year, confronted by gains that would have been too fanciful for expectation a few months ago, what criticisms do those completely opposed to the recovery program muster? Some of their objections are a medley of contradictions. One camp wants to abandon the program because it has not accomplished enough, and the other camp wants to scrap it because it has been so successful that it is not needed any longer. No one can be certain in which of the two camps a single critic may be found on a particular day. There seems to be a free passage between the two.

In the first camp the very people who insisted that the program would not achieve anything, and who predicted that we would recover in 4 years without doing anything, are now complaining that the program has not worked miracles in 1 year. The same individuals insist that recovery was on the way in May 1933 and that the program has had nothing to do with it. These mythical and marvelous speculators as to what might have been were not so confident at that time when they besieged the Government with petitions to aid their own sinking ships.

More important are the inhabitants of camp 2, who claim that the program has outlived its original usefulness. They can think of a program only in terms of its capacity to further their own narrow interests. Now that the back of the depression is broken and their own scalps saved, they want freedom to return to the old regime of uncontrolled selfishness and heartless exploitation. The more successful we are in outlawing the abuses of the past, the more we may expect to hear protests from those who were nourished on such abuses.

Far more worthy and useful are the critics who realize that the haphazard planlessness of the past must give way to the rule of intelligence and order, but who see specific defects in the new-deal program. It will be very fruitful to examine their objections in detail and to attempt to separate the dross from the gold.

The charge of price fixing is an old battle cry which has frequently obscured the realities of the price problem. There are only two aspects of prices that are important: First, price as a measure of the real cost of producing an article or a service, and, secondly, price as the value placed upon an article or a service in terms of other goods for which it may be exchanged. For example, the fact that the selling price of an automobile has risen from $1,500 to $1,800 is not significant until we know whether or not this represents a rise in the real cost of producing the automobile, or a relative rise in the exchange value of the automobile, or merely a general rise in the nominal price of all commodities.

Under the old system of ruthless and wasteful competition real costs were excessively high, and therefore the price which society as a whole had to pay for goods and services was great. In addition, since the antitrust laws did not in the slightest prevent monopolistic or predatory practices, many industries were able to place inordinately high exchange valuations upon their products, and thus to take constant toll of the consuming public.

The recovery program attacks the price problem very simply. By promoting rational production and eliminating destructive competition it seeks to reduce real social costs. By establishing a balance between production and profits on one side and wages on the other it seeks to promote healthy price relationships and to prevent any particular group from becoming too favored in the exchange process.

Let us examine whether business cooperation has brought unchecked price rises that have canceled wage advances and plundered the consumer. In the early part of the year the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said:

> At the present time millions of dollars are being extorted from the profits of the masses in prices which are fixed by combines, trusts, and monopolies (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 873).

I believe that when we substitute careful scrutiny of reliable statistics for generalities we find these charges to be inexact. The general raising of the price level has characterized every revival that we have experienced, and it is elemental economics that prices at the beginning of revival rise faster than wage rates. But every sign is at hand that prices are definitely under control and are being brought into line with the incomes of the masses of consumers. The sharp rise of 17 percent in wholesale prices between March and August 1933 has been followed by a fairly even keel since then, with variations keeping within a range of 2 percent. Retail prices likewise shot up 17 percent during the early period of recovery but have remained remarkably steady since the middle of last November.

The truth is that even during the first hectic dislocation of the recovery drive prices never rose enough to injure the consumer. If we regard the individual wage earner, who works full time, we find he has not made appreciable progress since a year ago. In contrast to this, however, the purchasing power of the entire wage-earning class, owing to reemployment in private industry alone, has risen 23 percent during the past 12 months. Thus the working class as a whole, and in most cases the working family, has one quarter more in real earning power than a year ago. This amounts to over $400,000,000 per month, independent of Government pay rolls.

I do not mean to deny that some prices are too high today. Nor do I deny that there are some industries which are engaged in price fixing to the detriment of the public welfare. But despite this, the general tendency is favorable, the underlying method of approach of the recovery program is sound, and the need today is to make that program even more effective and to prevent its instrumentalities of control from falling into the hands of selfish groups.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator will permit me, I should prefer not to be interrupted until I shall have concluded, when I shall be very glad to answer any questions.

Mr. COUZENS. Very well. I do not wish to interrupt the continuity of the Senator's speech, but there are several questions I should like to have him answer.

Mr. WAGNER. The second, and in some respects the major, charge leveled against the new-deal program is that it has benefited the large industrialist at the expense of the small business man. The eloquent Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] said some time ago that the small business man is marching to his grave under the N.R.A., and he has received support from the report of Mr. Darrow and his associates. When this criticism was made in June, I had to rely upon logic and history for my answer. I asked how it could be concluded logically that the small man would be injured by the first law that gave him real representation in the councils of industry and enlisted governmental supervision in his behalf. I illustrated by economic history that for 40 years the spirit of the antitrust laws had been systematically subverted and that the small man had found himself pulverized under the wheels of giant industry.

Today we need not rely upon logic or historical analogy. The facts of the living present are before us, and they are, on the whole, favorable. The upward sweep has encompassed every type of industry, both those employing huge numbers of men and those where the individual aggregates of capital and labor are very small.

In April 1934, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, only 2 manufacturing industries out of 90 failed to show gains in employment over the preceding year, and every one showed gains in pay rolls. These increases have not been confined to the automobile and iron and steel industries, with 1,000 workers per plant, nor to the cotton textiles, with units of 500 workers, nor to the electrical and machinery trade, with 300 men in each plant. They have extended equally to the fertilizer industry, with only 40 men per plant, to book jobbers and jewelers, equally small, and to the butter trade with a unit size of 18. Furthermore, the vast majority of establishments in these latter trades employ far fewer men than the average number, and are, indeed, very small.

It has been claimed that the small man is injured by the minimum-wage provisions of the recovery law. I cannot believe that those who advance this claim realize the implications of what they are saying. I cannot believe that anyone is ready to admit that a country so wealthy as ours is willing to found its so-called " prosperity " upon the wage slavery of its workers. The new standards which have been set do not seat the workers in the lap of luxury; they are the minimum requirements for health and decency, and any business which cannot conform to them has no justification for existence. The vast majority of small business men are able and willing to pay these minimum wages and realize that the increased purchasing power throughout the country is the touchstone of their own prosperity as well as that of large industry.

The point I wish to make is that the small business man has benefited by the recovery program in the sense that he is far more prosperous than before its passage, and that it holds great promise for him in the future.

But it is true, and many able Senators and Mr. Darrow's Board have rendered a great service by bringing it to light, that the small man still suffers from many of the monopolistic tyrannies that have persisted for half a century. The small man still is subject to the unfair competition of some large opponents who get special favors from banks and railroads, who can afford temporarily to sell below cost in order to crush the small man, who fix prices, and who manipulate the sources of supply and demand to serve their own selfish interests.

How may these evils be remedied? Certainly not by repealing the sections of the Recovery Act which modify the antitrust laws, for all these evils existed when those laws were in full force. It is not the code idea that promotes monopoly. In fact, the able Senator from Idaho has said:

> I do not believe, as has been suggested somewhere, that the extortion takes place by connivance with the code or in accordance with the terms of the code. I believe this extortion takes place in defiance of the spirit of the code and in defiance of the terms of the code. We will never be able to bring about a different condition until we have a greater and stronger power back of the code; that is the power to punish for the doing of such things. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 18, p. 873).

If the Senator admits that monopolistic practices violate the codes and the law, what greater power does he seek? The antitrust laws are still in force, except insofar as they are abrogated by the code provisions. The code provisions are still subject to the requirement that they shall neither promote monopoly nor tend to oppress small enterprise. The Federal Trade Commission has been ordered, whenever complaint is made, to pass judgment upon whether or not the code violates the antimonopoly section of the Recovery Act. There are ampler facilities today for preventing monopoly and oppressive practices than ever before.

The Darrow supplementary report recognizes fully that we cannot return to the wildly disorganized economy of Adam Smith. It states:

To go back to unregulated competition in which the small man can gain his share of the market by some special advance of skill or other factor is not possible in the situation where technological advance has produced a surplus, so that unregulated competition demoralizes both wages and prices and brings on recurrent and increasingly severe industrial depressions.

These words might have been plucked from the plea which I made for the enactment of the recovery law almost a year ago.

The Darrow supplementary report further recognizes that some form of social control and cooperation is essential in the twentieth century, and that if we do not choose one form we shall be forced into another that is more alien to our traditions and more restrictive of our liberties. It says that:

The choice is between monopoly sustained by government, which is clearly the trend of the National Recovery Administration, and a planned economy, which demands socialized ownership and control, since only by collective ownership can the inevitable conflict of separately owned units for the market be eliminated in favor of planned production. * * * The hope for the American people * * * lies in the planned use of America's resources following socialization.

I do not believe—and I do not think that most of those who purport to agree with Mr. Darrow believe—that it is necessary or desirable for us to go this far. We are not going this far. The recovery program affords us an opportunity to solve economic problems of unprecedented complexity without departing from our liberal traditions and accustomed folkways. It reconciles liberty and law in an American way.

The only difficulty is that we have not seized these opportunities in full. The recovery program has helped the small man to recover from the depression, and it has brought out into the open monopolistic abuses that were ignored when we were self-satisfied with the antitrust laws. But it has done very little to cure these abuses, though it has a finer mechanism than we had ever before for so doing. It has succeeded in recovery; it has fallen far short of reform. Its greatest potentialities are still unexplored and await further action.

Another criticism voiced in the Darrow report is that our attempts to rationalize production by preventing the enlargement of plant and field capacities are a drain upon our potential enjoyment of wealth.

While it is very true that general overproduction is impossible, there can be temporary overproduction of specific articles when many independent agencies strive blindly to capture more than their normal share of the competitive market, and there can be profligate production and consequent exhaustion of our limited natural resources, such as petroleum and timber. Neither of these two evils could be avoided under absolute laissez faire. Competitive overproduction could not be checked so long as cooperation was impossible. The waste of resources could not be stopped even where monopoly existed, for it profited those in control to exploit those resources as rapidly as possible.

For these reasons sage students of our industrial order have recognized the temporary necessity of some control over production. Certainly Mr. Justice Brandeis is a believer in free enterprise and a constant protestant against the evils of monopoly. But when faced with the question of a certificate of convenience and necessity, in the now-famous case of New State Ice Co. against Liebman, Two hundred and Eighty-fifth United States Reports, page 262, 1932, he wrote:

All agree that irregularity in employment—the greatest of our evils—cannot be overcome unless production and consumption are more nearly balanced. Many insist that there must be some form of economic control. There are plans for proration. There are plans for stabilization. Some thoughtful men of wide business experience insist that all projects for stabilization and proration must prove futile unless, in some way, the equivalent of the certificate of public convenience and necessity is made a prerequisite to embarking new capital in an industry in which the capacity already exceeds the production schedules.

However, I am not a scarcity economist. In the vast majority of cases I believe that the long-range task is not to limit production but to produce as much as possible and to distribute the products widely and equitably. But let it not be supposed that this was the policy under the old deal The common belief that industry poured forth goods at maximum capacity which people could not buy because of low wages is only half correct. The selfish quest for profits served frequently to reduced production. Industrial sabotage for the purpose of preserving high prices was a frequent occurrence. This practice resulted in direct and extreme loss to consumers, who received less goods and had to pay an artificially high price for them. In the long run it worked to the disadvantage of industry, for in general withholding production is wasteful and economically indefensible.

The antitrust remedy was founded upon belief that limited production rests upon monopoly, and that the one could be prevented by prohibiting the other. Forty years have demonstrated that restraining practices flourished despite the law. The only effect of the law was to create a pretense that black was white and thus to prevent the Government from stepping in to protect the worker and the consumer.

The immediate problem before us, to which sufficient attention has not yet been paid, is to prevent the production-control devices of the new deal from being turned into an old-deal instrument for the profit of the few and the denial of the many. We must develop to the limit our natural wealth without exploiting it, and we must make it serve social needs. It is at this crucial stage that forceful and careful and patriotic criticism such as has been forthcoming during the past few months is necessary.

More fundamental than any of the questions which I have been discussing is the relationship between wages and profits. A balance between the return to industry and the return to labor is at the very core of economic stability, and it is here that the new-deal program seems in greatest need of immediate improvement.

During the period between June and October 1933 hours of work were reduced 16 percent and employment increased 19 percent, although production was declining by 17 percent. Paradoxical as it may seem, subsequent improvements in the general condition of business have been matched by increasing unwillingness to reduce hours and to raise wages. Between October 1933 and March 1934 production increased over 11 percent. During the first quarter of 1934 corporation earnings have been three times as great as during the same period last year. Out of 670 dividend changes reported by Standard Statistics 515 were favorable, as compared with only 156 a year ago. But this latter period has witnessed a gain of only 1.5 percent in employment, hours of labor have been actually lengthened by one-half hour per week, and the real earnings of the individual worker are not appreciably greater than they were in March 1933.

If the return of prosperity, as measured by increased industrial output and higher profits, is going to be accompanied by a desire to return to the wage philosophy of the 1920's, additional and more serious depressions are only a matter of a few years.

The wage problem is not merely a technical question of providing enough purchasing power to keep industry running at full speed. We cannot justify ourselves in stopping short when that level is reached. We must go on to create a fairer system, in which the worker shall share equitably in our great wealth and live in comfort and security. To deny this right to men who are intelligent is to invite unrest and violence.

The same principles apply to hours of labor. Most of the maximum-hour scales are far too high even by the narrow test of reemployment measures. They are indefensibly high when contrasted with the number of hours that people shall be required to work in a highly industrialized civilization.

Finally, let us turn to problems of administration. General Johnson and the men under him have faced a superhuman task with superhuman efforts, with vision, fairness, and courage. There has been no time since the war, and possibly not even then, when the public service here in Washington has attracted so many people of the highest caliber intent upon service and relatively unguided by the desire for personal aggrandizement. They deserve the highest tribute.

The able critics of the recovery program have said that it is fatally defective because it is advised by the very leaders who brought about disaster in 1929. I do not believe that our troubles were brought on solely by improper leadership; many of them were caused by an outworn economic system. The same men, when given an opportunity to cooperate and to receive the advice of Government, may achieve far better results. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of force in this thoughtful criticism.

The cooperation of industry and labor should be balanced by governmental agencies for the protection of the public. Obviously there would be no such balance if the Recovery Administration itself were composed preponderantly of men whose primary associations are with particular interests. If Government is going to participate in economic affairs, an independent and unhampered public service should be developed for this purpose, just as for the administration of justice, the preservation of peace, and the education of the young. I realize that this cannot be done overnight, because the trained personnel does not exist. I believe that it will be done within a reasonable time and that we should turn our efforts in that direction.

I am not devoting any special attention today to the labor problems of the new deal, because I expect to discuss these before the Senate in the near future.

We cannot measure the accomplishments of the past year simply by telling the bloodless story of reopened banks and factories, nor even by counting the millions of families whose lives have been removed from the dark cellars of extreme poverty. Of far greater significance is our new faith in democratic government as an instrument for promoting the common weal. With pride in our progress, and with humility in our mistakes, let us continue the recreation of a mighty nation serving the purposes of mankind.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, as I have already spoken once on the subject now before the Senate, the so-called "tariff bill", I shall be very brief in adding a few further remarks at this time. I desire to speak about the bill now pending before the Senate which proposes to give to the President power to negotiate reciprocal tariff agreements with other countries and put them into force without referring them to Congress for approval.

I should like to discuss this proposed legislation in two parts: First, to point out certain of the general objections to the bill; secondly, to consider in some detail its possible effect upon the people of the State of New Jersey.

Before considering these general objections, it is perhaps well to outline briefly the major provisions of the bill.

In addition to conferring upon the President power to negotiate trade agreements without submitting them to Congress for approval, the bill authorizies him to raise or lower, by 50 percent, and duty in the existing tariff law. The agreements that are entered into are subject to termination on due notification within 3 years, but may be continued indefinitely if this notice is not given. The authorization of these powers has been asked for on the ground that it is essential as a part of the recovery program to stimulate our exports, and it has been frankly stated that we cannot expect to increase our exports without making provision to receive corresponding increases in importations. It is fair to assume that we already import as much duty-free merchandise as we can use; so, if we are to enter into reciprocal arrangements with other countries, it must be in terms of concessions in the dutiable list.

As Senators know, I have endeavored to support the administration in its recovery program; and I should be extremely reluctant to take a stand in opposition to this proposed transfer of power if I were at all convinced that it is an essential unit in the recovery program. I am satisfied, however, that rather than being an essential unit in the recovery program the authorization of power to the President to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements constitutes a very real menace to some of the most fundamental elements in the rest of the recovery program.

Senators are all aware of the fact that the President has urged upon industry operating under N.R.A. codes that they further shorten the hours of labor and increase the rates of pay. They should also know that one of the problems that are still matters of major concern to the administration is the stimulation of the so-called "durable-goods industries." It does not require much reflection to see that these two demands involve increased labor costs, on the one hand, and increased capital investment, on the other. It does not seem to me natural to expect that industries which are dependent on the tariff for their very existence will be willing to enter into commitments for increased expenditures in the face of a very real prospect that their tariff protection may be arbitrarily reduced. In other words, it seems to me very much as if industry were being asked to put some more chips on the table at the same time that they were told there were some marked cards in the deck.

One other point, I think, should be emphasized in connection with the argument that this move is essential to the recovery program. Both the President, in his message, and Secretary Hull, in his defense of the bill before the Ways and Means Committee in the House, emphasized the fact that quick results are not to be expected from this drastic change in our tariff policy. I take these observations as an indication of an attempt to establish a new type of commercial policy for our foreign trade, and an indication that, it is admitted, even by the proponents of this measure, any direct contributions to recovery in the immediate future will be comparatively slight.

This brings me to the consideration of a second argument that has been advanced in behalf of the proposed legislation. Because other countries follow this bargaining policy, and because our foreign trade has declined during the depression years, as has the foreign trade of every other country in the world, it has been argued that unless we devise some means by which we can imitate the horse-trading practices of other countries, it will be a matter of but little time before we shall have no foreign trade whatever. Such assertions are utterly without justification. As a matter of fact, our foreign trade for 1933 was greater, both in value and volume, in exports and imports than was our foreign trade in 1932.

We have been told repeatedly by the advocates of this bill that it is essential to have a quicker method of adjusting our tariff rates than the method which we now follow. They do not tell us, however, of the complications and animosities that a bargaining tariff policy is likely to stimulate. There is ample testimony from many responsible and well-informed people as to the undesirability of such a policy for the United States. Thomas Walker Page, a Democratic member of the Tariff Commission, and William Culbertson, a former member of the same body, have indicated their belief that such a policy is impracticable for the United States. The present United States Tariff Commission in a document published last year concluded a discussion of bargaining tariffs with the statement that because so many countries have been padding their tariffs for purposes of bargaining, "reciprocal tariff agreements by which concessions were made in return for the reduction of such temporary duties might mean the grant of valuable concessions in return for wholly problematical concessions."

Few things are closer to the people of America today than the subject of employment, or unemployment, whichever way we wish to put it. With some 10,000,000 or more wage earners unemployed, it is most natural that those who are employed and those hopeful of securing employment have reason to be apprehensive and fearful of any legislation which may result in decreasing employment opportunities for American workers.

In a report dated March 1, 1933, the United States Tariff Commission showed that the drop in American export trade resulted in 500,000 workers in the industrial and agricultural fields being deprived of employment opportunities. This number is but 5 percent of the number of workers who have been deprived of employment opportunities as a result of the drop in our domestic trade. It is readily apparent from these figures that a return to normal employment conditions is not dependent upon restoration of our foreign trade. The same Tariff Commission report shows that an increase of 12 percent in the wages of our industrial workers would, of itself, offset the entire loss of our export trade. I might add that there is further doubt of the value of foreign trade when we realize that exports to Europe, Asia, and South America must be paid for, as I have previously stated, in imports of manufactured goods, agricultural products, or minerals, or more I O U's.

There are other important arguments against this bill, but I shall not take the Senate's time to go over all of them, as they are already well known. I should like, however, to take a moment to draw attention to the possible effect upon the productive activity of one State of the Union, namely, New Jersey, my own State, with which, quite naturally, I am more familiar than any other.

According to the latest detailed census, 440,000 people were directly employed in the manufacturing industries in New Jersey. There is no published formula as to what industries would be selected for sacrifice, and all attempts to elicit from the advocates of this bill a list of industries that would be chosen have been unsuccessful. We have, however, the statement attributed to Hon. Harry L. Hopkins, Director of the Emergency Relief Administration, to the effect that it would be desirable to eliminate a number of the industries on the Atlantic seaboard; and we have some very definite statements by Secretary Hull as to some of the tests he would employ in choosing the duties which could be reduced. There is also much talk of eliminating the inefficient industries; but no one, as far as I know, has dared to describe the divining rod by which he could discover which industries are allegedly inefficient.

Obviously, if it is the intention of the administration that these powers shall be used, they must either sacrifice a large number of small industries or pick on a smaller number of major industries. In either event, the picture for New Jersey is not a happy one. Out of the 440,000 people employed in New Jersey manufacturing industries in 1929, 125,000 were employed in what we may define as the smaller industries. These industries include the leather industry, the pottery industry, manufacture of paints and varnishes, production of rubber goods, cast-iron pipe, pencils, pens, buttons, cutlery, embroideries, felt hats, and laces. They are entirely dependent upon a high protective tariff, and the other nations of the world would give much to see these industries put out of business.

If the administration should choose to center on the larger industries, we find an equally depressing picture as far as New Jersey is concerned. Over 150,000 residents of New Jersey are employed in these larger industries. These industries include manufacture of silk and rayon products, dying and finishing of textiles, production of many forms of electrical machinery, clothing, chemicals, and glass.

So, if we combine the employment in the small industries with the employment in the major industries in New Jersey most likely to suffer from this policy, we discover that over 60 percent of the industries of the State would be put in a position of complete uncertainty as to the future. I do not suggest that all of these industries would be eliminated; but I do state that, in view of the terms of the proposed legislation, it will become foolhardy for the industries to enter into any commitments which involve further obligations.

I wish to refer also to the present critical situation with relation to trade development in the world owing to the encroachments of Japan in the world markets. This has already been given extra emphasis by the recent practical declaration of war on Japanese encroachments by Great Britain, which have been so serious to the Britons that Japan has practically taken from them the cotton-goods trade in India, as well as making serious encroachments in Canada, Africa, and Australia. The same encroachment in France has been so serious that the Lyons Chamber of Commerce has petitioned the French Government for protection against it.

If the pending tariff bill shall be enacted, it will be impossible, under the most-favored-nation clause, for our Government to negotiate any treaty with relation to any government in the world without extending the same benefits and reductions to Japan and China under existing treaties. It might be considered as inevitable that the United States will find itself in even a worse position than either France or England in a trade war with the Orient because of the wage levels established by the N.R.A.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator is aware of the fact that New Jersey is the proud possessor of the greatest chemical industrial business in the United States?

Mr. BARBOUR. I know that.

Mr. HATFIELD. He is also aware of the fact that this industry was largely developed within a period of 15 years?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is true.

Mr. HATFIELD. Due to the fact that it has had a sufficient protective tariff to assure its growth and development?

Mr. BARBOUR. The Senator is perfectly correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. He is further aware of the fact that New Jersey at one time had the only ultra-marine blue chemical industry in the United States, and that that industry was destroyed by the ability of the German industry to undersell the American industry because there was not sufficient protection afforded to assure a continuation of the life of that industry in New Jersey?

Mr. BARBOUR. I thank the Senator very much for his very timely observations. I should like to say to the Senator that it is my intention later to offer an amendment directly affecting the very industry to which the Senator refers, speaking now more particularly of the dye industry.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator is further aware of the fact that for 150 years the United States had no chemical industry?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is true; and it will not have any for the next 150 years if we shall tinker with and reduce the tariff.

Mr. HATFIELD. I agree with the Senator's statement.

Mr. BARBOUR. I thank the Senator again.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I should like to direct the attention of the Senate to the possibility of stimulating American export trade by entirely pro-American means. I refer to the huge foreign imports into the United States each year, and I desire to point out that if a system of reciprocal trading is to be set up, which I do not advocate, in that event certainly the trade favors which foreign countries already enjoy in the United States to the extent of $1,400,000,000 a year, should be the basis of the bargainings. I see nothing unfair or illogical in asking for reciprocal advantages, if that sort of thing is to be done, in return for a continuation of this enormous trade. Why deal only in the further extension of new and additional trade advantages within the United States at the expense of some American protected commodity of either agriculture or industry?

I for one cannot think in terms of always bargaining on the basis of concessions or loans. The existing privileges and advantages held in the United States by other nations that show no inclination to pay their debts should be the basis of the proposed negotiations, if there is to be any tariff bargaining at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In full confirmation of what the Senator has just said, I wish to call his attention to the statement issued by the Department of State on December 15, 1933, in which it was indicated that a so-called "model reciprocal agreement" had been negotiated between Colombia and the United States. Up to date they have not allowed us to see this interesting model agreement, but in the press release of the Department of State on the 15th of December it was indicated that they had made this tentative agreement with Colombia on the basis merely of agreeing to continue the existing exemptions on the free list in behalf of Colombian products. In other words, that for which the Senator from New Jersey contends and which he recently joined me in supporting in a public statement, is so completely practical, even from the standpoint of those who are contending for the pending reciprocal tariff agreement bill, that it is borne out and personified and exemplified by the one so-called "model agreement" at which we have not thus far been permitted to peep. In other words, the Senator is not only justified in what he says by the logic of the situation, but he is actually justified by the tentative operations of the State Department itself.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed the Senator from Michigan has drawn attention to the sample case, so to speak, to which he refers, which illustrates so completely what he and I have felt all along and what I said a moment ago. The President can take action along that line whenever and as often as there is any need for it without this particular piece of legislation for which he is asking, just as he has the power to increase tariffs now under the provisions of the N.R.A. law, which gives him that authority.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to know whether or not the shrinkage in imports and the shrinkage in exports are relative so far as imports which are free of duty and imports which may bear a duty are concerned. In other words, have we not suffered about the same decline in the economic turnover on imports which are free of duty as in the case of imports on which a duty is charged?

Mr. BARBOUR. The Senator is quite correct. As I said a moment ago, speaking along the same general line, while many Senators on the other side of the aisle stress the point that our exports have fallen off, the exports of every country about which I have been able to secure any information have also fallen off. The business of the whole world is somewhat lower and, as the Senator has said, it does not take any stretch of the imagination at all to lead one to the conclusion that, if anything, the imports of merchandise and other commodities on the free list are slightly lower in proportion than are those on the dutiable list.

Mr. DICKINSON. Permit me to make the further suggestion, that the decrease in our economic turnover, as will be found if it is studied commodity by commodity, occurs in the heaviest percentage in the articles which the people can get along without. It will be found that the commodities the people must have are maintaining a higher level in the economic turnover than are those we can get along without. For instance, there has been a tremendous decline in the sale of automobiles, because there has not been the capacity to buy them or the capacity to operate them there once was. We find also that there has been a decline in the consumption of foodstuffs, yet the percentage of decline is not so great as in the case of commodities, such as automobiles, radios, jewelry, and what might be called "semi-necessary articles."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I think one of the key objections in the whole situation can be summed up in a word; that is, the uncertainty of the whole undertaking. No one knows where the lightning will strike next, or how hard it will strike, or what the intent of the administration will be. As a matter of fact, the administration stress the fact that they want to be in a position to move overnight in the White House, in order to do the thing effectively. In my opinion, that is not only un-American but it is also disconcerting to such a degree as to mean chaos so far as business is concerned.

Mr. DICKINSON. In line with the old theory that the right to tax is also the right to destroy, it will put the business man in a quandary as to what his future is to be the minute we adopt a theory of this kind.

Mr. BARBOUR. It will put the business man in the frame of mind where he will feel it to be foolish to undertake any commitment if his industry is in a measure dependent upon protection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to make an observation in line with the statement just made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. Of course, the power to tax is the power to destroy, and in this instance there is the deliberate purpose to destroy, because we are advised that the new rule which is to determine the maintenance of protection is not a rule related to differences in cost of production, but it is a rule relating solely to the question whether or not the new tariff commissars in the United States think an existing business is efficient and nonexpensive. They intend to destroy those businesses which they consider to be expensive and inefficient. They intend to use the tax power for the purpose of destruction. That is implicit in the very program which they bring us.

Mr. BARBOUR. And further than that, Mr. President, along the very line of the intent and the danger of that intent, to which the Senator from Michigan has drawn attention, in my judgment, that intent exists with reference to areas as well as to industries.

I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the Senate, because the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] is to follow me.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator in his address referred to the controversy between Great Britain and Japan. I wish the Senator would emphasize the fact that Great Britain, according to the announcement of Runciman, did not resort to bargaining tariffs to cure her difficulty, as she had the power to do had she wanted to, but, instead, inaugurated a form of protective tariff, such as we are trying to preserve.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am grateful to the Senator from Ohio for bringing out that fact, which, of course, I had in mind, although perhaps I did not express it clearly.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have printed and lie on the table. I shall want to bring up the amendment at a later date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, according to reports, the Code Authorities, those business interests placed in control of our American industries since they have been regimented under the N.R.A., have, during the past few weeks, found it necessary to curtail production because of what they contend is overproduction or lack of purchasing power.

The American Federation of Labor reports that unemployment is increasing, and predicts a substantial increase in the millions of unemployed within the next few months.

Thus management and workers have called the attention of Congress to the immediate need for legislation which will help and not retard recovery.

Industrialists who believed themselves compelled to operate under the N.R.A., through which the Government has permitted some groups to exploit the consumers and workers by the suspension of the antitrust laws, and by means of minimum wages and maximum hours, cannot be expected to come out and state that recovery is being retarded as a result of legislation demanded by the very administration which has surrendered to them. Codes have increased production costs, and many codes have caused undue price advances which may curtail consumption.

Mr. President, I digress at this point long enough to pay tribute to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], who has given to this Nation and to the world a description of the administration of the National Recovery Act which should impress the mind of every man beneath the American flag, and I trust that as time goes on this distinguished representative from the great State of North Dakota will still uncover and unfold the course along which this administration will lead the industrial group of our country, if its course is not stayed by the Congress of the United States.

Naturally, factories and workshops producing articles or commodities which are unable to meet the competition of the products of European and Asiatic workers without proper tariff protection will hesitate to purchase raw materials, and will hesitate to employ labor when they see the administration forcing Congress to enact legislation which makes possible the lowering of tariff rates some 50 percent by a mere Executive fiat.

With 10,000,000 or more workers unemployed and dependent upon public charity, the administration indicates its lack of interest by virtual notice to the American people that their interests now lie principally in guaranteeing profits to international financiers and those few possessing securities of foreign nations.

The recent decision of Attorney General Cummings, undoubtedly influenced by the White House, indicates the contempt which the President has for the intent of the Congress.

Under the able and inspiring leadership of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] the Congress voted to prohibit the sale in our country of securities of those foreign countries which had refused to pay their obligations, voluntarily entered into, to our country and our people.

This legislation was enacted with full realization that foreign governments, debtors to the United States, were reducing the taxes placed upon their people at the very moment we were enacting the highest taxes ever imposed upon the American people in peace times.

Mr. President, the American does not know what high taxation will mean if we expect to pay off our mounting public debt. Our high taxes mean high costs of production.

Yet, Mr. President, we find Great Britain owing to the United States Government $4,636,157,358.30, of which $176,120,246.63 is in default. Through the decision of the Attorney General—which to my mind is clearly contrary to the intent of the Congress and the legislation enacted—Great Britain is placed in a position wherein her present leaders can laugh at the efforts of the American Congress; and Great Britain can continue to reduce the taxes on her people and still refuse to pay her obligations to the United States.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a statement of the debt owed by Europe to the United States, and I ask that it be placed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Grand total	2,710,451,610.40	662,108,837.36

NOTE.—Finland, with a total debt of $8,726,645.63, has met every payment when due.

The situation will change on June 15, when further installments fall due as follows:

Great Britain, $85,670,765; France, $59,000,218; Italy, $14,741,593; Belgium, $7,159,453; Poland, $4,039,039; Czechoslovakia, $1,682,812; Rumania, $1,248,750; Estonia, $322,850; Yugoslavia, $800,000; Finland, $166,538; Lithuania, $147,864; Latvia, $134,883; Hungary, $32,669.

Mr. HATFIELD. Surely it will not be contended that the token payment of 4.2 percent of that which is due, on the part of a nation which is solvent enough to reduce the taxes upon her own people, meets the financial obligations which she owes.

Not only has Great Britain refused to meet the payments due to the United States but she has publicly stated—for actions speak louder than words—that no provision is made in her budget for debt payments to the United States.

Most likely, Mr. President, the officers of the Bank of England have been advised by the international financiers, who have influenced the President to insist on legislation which will add millions of workers to the lists of the unemployed if we accept payment of debts in goods through the making of secret reciprocal trade treaties.

We are told that in view of the opposition of some Democratic Senators, who fear possible political trouble if they vote to grant this plenary treaty-making power to the President—which means life or death to the workers, farmers, and miners—that a concession will be made wherein the President will be authorized to give a notice to those interests which are affected by such reciprocal trade treaties.

What value are such hearings if the parties concerned will have no knowledge of the contentions being made by those who wish to benefit the foreigners at the expense of the American people?

On May 1 I addressed the Senate and made reference to the reciprocal-trade treaty signed last December on the part of the State Department and Colombia. At that time I directed attention to the unwillingness of the State Department to even indicate the articles or commodities referred to in that reciprocal-trade treaty.

Since that time I have had occasion to look up the exports of Colombia, and I find that the exports of that country are principally coffee, 1,600,000 bags average in 5 years, 85 percent of which is imported into the United States, bananas, pineapples, cotton, rubber, tobacco, sugar, wheat, barley, potatoes, oats. Colombia has the largest potential oil field, some 34,000 square miles of proven oil territory, Mr. President, a territory 10,000 square miles greater than the great State of West Virginia, which I have the honor in part to represent in this body. Colombia also exports gold, platinum, and emeralds.

However, as a result of the interest which I displayed in that treaty, I have secured information as to its presumed contents, which information, if true, surely indicates that the treaty has not been negotiated with the intention on the part of the administration to increase employment opportunities of American workers or to benefit American farmers, but solely for the further enrichment of a few wealthy American concerns which possess valuable concessions in Colombia and which ship large portions of their products into the United States.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me?

Mr. HATFIELD. I gladly yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to inquire, in view of the fact that practically all the exports from Colombia are agricultural or raw products——

Mr. HATFIELD. That is very true.

Mr. DICKINSON. If that same condition does not apply to practically all the South American countries?

Mr. HATFIELD. It undoubtedly does.

Mr. DICKINSON. And also to Canada on our north?

Mr. HATFIELD. I think that is a correct statement. I may say to the Senator from Iowa that 90 percent of the imports coming from Colombia are represented by two commodities, one of which is fruit and the other crude oil.

Mr. DICKINSON. Both of which we produce in this country.

Mr. HATFIELD. We produce them bountifully; in fact, we have an overproduction.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then, I presume, we are going to have a great time trading jackknives with Colombia, which produces a surplus of the very commodities which we also produce in surplus.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is my fear.

Mr. DICKINSON. The same thing applies to Russia. The principal Russian exports are lumber products, wheat, barley, and other grains, and yet we are establishing a bank with a hundred million dollars capital, supplied by Government funds, to increase our trade with Russia.

Mr. HATFIELD. And because of these fears, Mr. President, I asked the Secretary of State for information upon the subject matter of this treaty. His assistant, who was very courteous, very considerate, very friendly, stated to me that it was a secret and that he could not give me the information but that he would do the very best thing, and he did it very promptly. So he sent me a news release which the office of the Secretary of State was willing to give to the public. That was all the information that a United States Senator was entitled to, notwithstanding he represented a State whose interests are involved in the production of the same commodities which are shipped here from the great Republic of Colombia.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HATFIELD. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. DICKINSON. There can be no secrecy, though, about the products in which we can trade with Colombia, can there?

Mr. HATFIELD. None whatever.

Mr. DICKINSON. Therefore, it was simply secret with reference to the type of negotiation as to who shall be crucified and who shall be assisted?

Mr. HATFIELD. Not only is that true, Mr. President, but if it was a treaty that was going to be helpful to the American toiler, to the American people as a whole, to the consumers of this country, they should know of it; it should be made public.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad to yield to the able Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand the Senator has a resolution pending asking for permission to look at this treaty?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I trust the Senator proposes to ask for action in the course of the day upon his resolution.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is my purpose to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senators are referring to a treaty in process of negotiation. They are insisting upon the publication of the treaty before the negotiation has been completed and before the Executive chooses to transmit it to the Senate. I will say now that I cannot consent to the resolution proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. It does not seem to me to be proper to ask the President, as the resolution does, about a treaty of this character.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield, with the permission of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator from Arkansas understand that this treaty is one which is subsequently to be submitted to the Senate for ratification?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no information about the matter except what I have obtained in the process of debate here. If it is a treaty, of course, it has to be submitted for ratification, and I assumed that the Senators knew what they were talking about when they characterized it as a treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Michigan are forced to rely upon such information as is available from the State Department respecting this matter, and the State Department, in a press release of December 15, states that it is a reciprocal trade agreement, and also states that—

> It will come into force after the necessary legislative action shall have been taken in the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, that is a very different thing from a treaty, if that statement be correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, Mr. President, we confront the situation that this is not a treaty which was negotiated last fall and winter, which it is expected to submit to the Senate in due order, but it is a trade agreement in anticipation of the action of Congress upon the pending bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, no trade agreement can become effective until there is authority of law for it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly not, but we then confront the contemplation that this is the exercise, the tentative exercise, of a power not yet granted by Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it cannot be the exercise of a power not granted; that is impossible, both in law and in fact.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And yet exists.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What the Senator means to say, I presume, is that in anticipation of the possible grant of authority negotiations have been in progress with Colombia.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is not a matter of negotiations being in progress; it is a matter, according to the Department of State, of the signing of a reciprocal trade agreement 4 months before we even have an opportunity to decide in Congress whether or not the President is entitled to proceed to negotiate one of these trade agreements.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the execution of such an agreement would be void unless validated by law.

Mr. HATFIELD. Not only is what the Senator from Michigan says true, but the news release states that the contracting parties are waiting for proper legislation to put it into effect.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad to yield to the able Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The question of secrecy has been discussed, and that is one of the elements claimed to be necessary in connection with proposed tariff bargaining.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is true.

Mr. FESS. I wonder if the Senator recalls the famous contribution upon the tariff question by Woodrow Wilson in 1909?

Mr. HATFIELD. I have read the contribution of that distinguished American with a great deal of interest.

Mr. FESS. May I read one paragraph?

Mr. HATFIELD. I should be delighted to have the Senator read a paragraph.

Mr. FESS. I quote from Woodrow Wilson as follows:

> It is the policy of silence and secrecy, indeed, with regard to the whole process that makes it absolutely inconsistent with every standard of public duty and political integrity.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator for contributing the quotation of this famous statesman to the discussion.

Mr. President, I have reason to believe that this so-called "reciprocal trade treaty" between the United States and Colombia was made in order to protect American petroleum and American fruit interests with large holdings in Colombia from the payment of export taxes on petroleum and fruits which these interests ship into American markets, using low-paid foreign labor.

Of course, Mr. President, the United States of America cannot apply an export tax, but I understand that form of taxation is in vogue in Colombia.

The farm States of the West and Southwest are the principal beneficiaries of the excise tax placed on imports of petroleum. Surely it is not helping the people of those States to remove or reduce the excise tax on imports of petroleum.

We are today operating the petroleum industry of America under a code; we are permitting, through the Government of the United States, only a certain percentage of well production, and in some instances one oil corporation in America is capable of producing daily a sufficient amount of oil for every purpose, for every consuming need.

Further, is it not possible that Venezuela will demand and receive similar concessions from the United States for her oil and fruits, and that every other country will do likewise?

For the benefit of those who may have been led to believe that this reciprocal trade treaty will advance the sale of our surplus wheat, pork products, or corn, let me remind the Senate that Argentina has an exportable surplus of wheat, hides, meats, corn, and other agricultural products.

It is possible that the reciprocal trade treaty, entered into with Colombia on the part of the State Department last December, contains provisions which will benefit some of the people of our country. If so, why the secrecy?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I gladly yield to the able Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Arkansas, who, I regret, has left the floor, chided the Senator from West Virginia and myself for not knowing whether this pending thing is a treaty or a trade agreement. I find upon further consultation with page 7755 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where the initial publication appears, that the Assistant Secretary of State refers to it in one instance as a treaty and in the other instance as a reciprocal trade agreement. So the confusion in which the Senator from West Virginia and myself find ourselves also communicates itself to the State Department.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Was any hearing held or were any American interests, other than those owning possessions or concessions in Colombia, consulted or given an opportunity to protest before this treaty was entered into on the part of our State Department? Under this bill it may be promulgated without review by the Senate.

When that time comes after the enactment of the pending tariff legislation, what will be the embarrassing attitude of the American oil industry and of the American people generally? When this power is given to the President of the United States, if the legislation be constitutional, it will take a two-thirds vote of the Congress to relieve him of this great power which he would have.

Is it possible that this treaty will be nullified now after it has been signed by the contracting parties, as the result of any protest on the part of our American oil or fruit interests? Only the Senate can nullify it, and even the Senate could not do so should this measure become a law.

Mr. President, why is it that the Foreign Relations Committee cannot call before it the proper officials of the State Department now and examine the contents of this treaty which, under the Constitution, the Senate must ratify or reject if it is to assume that responsibility which the American people intend it to assume in keeping with its obligation and its oath?

Mr. President, this is but a sample of the treatment accorded the Congress since the inception of the new deal, we hear so much about, predicated upon control, reform, spend, and tax, with a besmirching of all that belongs to the past.

At a time when every real American is intent upon aiding recovery of our people, we are asked to legislate on tariff reform, to make the President a tariff dictator.

Since the inauguration on March 4, 1933, the Congress has delegated practically dictatorial powers to the President on the plea of emergency, and, further, that such powers were essential to immediate recovery.

It is common sense that we retard any possible recovery when the House passes and the powerful and influential Finance Committee of the Senate reports a measure, making the President a tariff dictator, which instills fear and uncertainty in the hearts and minds of millions of our people. Development, extension, and progress are at a standstill, owing to this overpowering uncertainty.

As the able senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] the other day pointed out, there is no man who is capable of allocating sufficient funds to develop an industry and to continue its progress by research essential to enable it to keep up with the trend of progress of industries in the Nation as compared with industries beyond the seas. It was my pleasure to point out to him one example dealing with the great chemical industry which has developed in the past 15 years under the Stars and Stripes through the protection of the Fordney-McCumber law and the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. There is being spent approximately, we are told, $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 yearly in research for the development and progress of the chemical industry of America, and today, because of its wonderful achievement, because of the enthusiasm, because of the stimulus that has been given to the American chemist, he can stand squarely on American soil and say to the chemists on the Rhine, "We have even surpassed you in progress and in development in the chemical world."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I gladly yield to the able Senator.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true in industry where there are many activities, one producing a certain article and another producing a similar article, as, for example, in the application of electricity, that the unit which fails to keep abreast of new inventions through research work is the one that must go down, and the one that survives and the cause of its survival is the amount of time, energy, money, and intelligence expended in the research field? Is not that true?

Mr. HATFIELD. It is absolutely true.

Mr. FESS. How much of it would have been done if it had had to be done by the dead hand of government?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, we would stand still, we would retrograde, we would go back to the period of the Dark Ages, in my judgment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. I understood the Senator from West Virginia had introduced a resolution asking the State Department to give the Senate full information regarding the Colombian Treaty which they have already negotiated in anticipation of the passage of the pending tariff bill. What became of the Senator's resolution?

Mr. HATFIELD. The resolution is now on the clerk's desk awaiting the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. When will we be able to bring it up for consideration? I think it might be quite enlightening to have the information called for by the resolution.

Mr. HATFIELD. I will say to the able Senator from Louisiana that I should be quite willing to have it brought up at any time.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum and then ask to have the resolution considered today?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the consideration of the resolution today.

Mr. McKELLAR. So shall I.

Mr. HATFIELD. I will say for the information of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana that the eminent leader on the majority side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], served notice a while ago that he would be compelled to object to the consideration of the resolution at the present time.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will permit me, I think we ought to know first just who has the pickle in the soak. It is a very odd thing that the State Department should want to be so very guarded about the thing that we cannot know what has already been done. What kind of a deal has been cooked up for the American people? Have they gone out and negotiated a treaty? Here are men in the Senate of the United States elected by the people and supposed to be the treaty-making body of the Government. Yet these officials are negotiating a treaty with Colombia as a result of which somebody is going to get it in the neck. They are going to take somebody's business away from them in this country. They have given out a press release stating that they have actually negotiated the treaty, but they do not want full information about it to get out until they get the matter confirmed by the Senate. In other words, here is a treaty which they do not think the Senate will approve and therefore they say, "Go ahead and enact a law ratifying the treaty before we let you see it or know what is in it."

That is a pretty good sample of the kind of thing that causes those of us who are trying to maintain a little of the spirit of constitutional government to become apprehensive. This would seem to be a dark-hour process of ratifying in advance something about which we have no knowledge whatever. It does not look very good to me. It is not what I would call "dealing in the light." In other words, if you are going to load the dice, at least let me see them when they fall. Give me that much chance.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the able Senator that, as I understand, the secret process is the only way in which reciprocal treaties will be negotiated under this bill if it shall become a law.

Mr. LONG. That may be true; but there is ethics in all lines. In other words, I would not intimate that anybody in this august body would engage in such a practice; but if a man went into a gambling dive where he knew they had the cards marked they would at least let him see one side of them. In this instance we cannot even see the back of the card. They want us to ratify in advance a treaty that they have made with Colombia.

What does Colombia produce? We all know that there is no product of Colombia that does not interfere with the products of either Arizona, Louisiana, Florida, or California, one or the others. They have oil in Colombia, they have certain fruits and certain vegetables and certain mines; that is all. Now, the State Department has a treaty all cooked up with Colombia, and they are holding it over here in cold storage waiting for the Senate to ratify it so that they can give it out to the world and cut somebody's throat, and they will not send it in here. It is the most ridiculous proposition I ever heard of.

Perhaps I do not understand legislating in a national way. I do not suppose I do. But I never understood that there was anything to be hidden in a matter of this kind or that we were called on to vote on something and approve something that we were not going to be allowed to see.

Who is afraid of this thing? Are we legislating in this country in such a way that we dare not let the people know what we are doing? Is that the kind of government we are running here—that we do not dare let the American people know what this treaty is that we have with Colombia, but we must enact this bill and then we are going to let them see what is in it? In other words, the doctor is going to pour a dose of medicine down us and he is not going to tell us what disease we are taking it for, and he will make us swallow it whether it is laudanum or arsenic or whatever it is that he is loading in, and nobody is going to know anything about it.

That is what I resent about this kind of thing—trying to enact that kind of proposition here and make people stand for it, and not be willing to bring the treaty in here and let it become known. That is the kind of thing that shows that this is an unwise and unacceptable policy that we are asked to pursue in turning over the treaty-making power to some agency besides the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. To this intelligent body it is not necessary to explain the function of the Executive and the function of the Senate in connection with treaties.

Many treaties have been negotiated which the President of the United States did not submit to the Senate because of changed conditions, and, perhaps, in some instances, because the President did not agree with provisions contained therein.

There is no compelling obligation upon the part of the President to submit a treaty to the Senate. No treaty becomes the law of the land, as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States, until it has been submitted and has been ratified.

Mr. LONG. Why, certainly not.

Mr. KING. I do not know anything about this alleged treaty with Colombia. My recollection is that the Secretary of State has stated before the Finance Committee, as well as elsewhere, that no treaties have been or are now being negotiated in anticipation of the so-called "tariff bill" which is under consideration here.

Moreover, Mr. President, may I say that any man who knows Franklin D. Roosevelt and the distinguished Secretary of State—men of character and ability—knows that they would not approve a treaty which they believed would prove injurious even in the slightest degree to our country.

I am not here to defend President Roosevelt, because he needs no defense; nor to defend the Secretary of State, because he needs no defense. Their records are before the American people.

They are men of honor, of character, and of the highest integrity. They love their country and will do as much for the maintenance of constitutional government and the rights and interests of the American people as any man who lives under the flag.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I hope my friend from Utah will not leave the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I have a committee appointment which compels me to leave the Chamber.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Utah has forgotten the Constitution. Let me say that there never has been a treaty negotiated which has not been submitted to the Senate before it became the law. A treaty must be submitted to the Senate or it cannot become a law; but here is a case in which the State Department have negotiated a treaty, and they not only will not submit it to the Senate but they are calling upon us to ratify it and make it a law before they will let us know what is in it.

My friend from Utah [Mr. KING], who has suddenly left the Chamber, I know for other and more important business—because no man could devote time less worthily, in my opinion, than to try to pass the bill we have before us right now—says that Mr. Roosevelt needs no defense. He does not. I am going to show you why Franklin Roosevelt needs no defense. Here is what he said about this kind of a bill.

Mr. Roosevelt on July 30, 1932, said this:

It is a difficult and highly technical matter to determine costs of production abroad and at home. A commission of experts can be trusted to find such facts. Then the facts should be left to speak for themselves, free from Presidential interference.

If Mr. Roosevelt's words are to be given the credit which the Senator from Utah says they should have—and I agree they should have—why do we not write into this bill a stipulation that if any reciprocal tariff agreements are to be made they shall be free from Executive interference, instead of being made by the Executive? When are we going to rely upon Mr. Roosevelt? Are we going to come here and say that the American people can depend on him, and then, when I read what he said, are we going to go back on his word?

Evidently the Senator from Utah does not think as much of Mr. Roosevelt as I think of him. I am going to say to these people that when they trusted in the word and in the promise of Mr. Roosevelt and of Huey Long, both of us were telling the truth, and both of us are still telling the truth, until Mr. Roosevelt comes in here and says that he did not mean this or that he did not say it, one of the two things.

This is not an attack upon Mr. Roosevelt. It is an attack made by forces that are not carrying out the philosophy that was presented by Mr. Roosevelt to the American people.

Let me read what was said by Mr. Hull, who has been so ably defended, and who comes from Tennessee and is a friend of mine, and who is negotiating these tariff arrangements. Mr. Hull on May 19, 1932, said:

I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the Tariff Act and demand its speedy repeal.

I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision, with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

That is the statement of Mr. Hull. He says that this flexible-tariff provision which he said he was going to help repeal, which was only about a drop in the bucket compared to the bill that is before us, abdicated more power than had been taken away from the British King by the House of Commons; and yet, praising Mr. Hull, as my friend from Utah has done, praising Franklin D. Roosevelt, as we all continue to do—we have to do it, you know [laughter]—continuing this praise, we sit here and allow these promises to the American people to go unfulfilled.

Not only have we President Roosevelt's words, but we had a very able running mate of the President of the United States in that election, who spoke on the matter, and we published this to the world.

Our distinguished Vice President, who deserves all the praises that can be given to any man—and some time I will write out a whole lot of them for use in the next campaign—said:

I want you all to turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes. Remember this, gentlemen, when the legislative body surrenders its tariff powers and obligations to the Executive.

And I could read many more lines; but my friend from West Virginia has kindly yielded to me, and I do not want to infringe upon his time.

The proposition which is up to the American people is, Is there such a thing in the Democratic Party as truth? That is all: Is there any such thing as truth in the Democratic Party and in Congress? That is the proposition. Are we going back on the word we gave the people? Are we going back on the promise of the Secretary of State and the President of the United States? After what we have told the country, from one end to the other, that this immense power that is about to be placed in the hands of the President should never be conferred, or anything akin to it, are we going to bow down here and have to go before the people humbly admitting that we meant nothing by what we promised, and that the platform on this question—which I can read, and will read at a little later time; I have already read it once, but I will read it again at some other point in this discussion—is going to be ignored by the party in power?

Not only that, but here is this request of the Senator from West Virginia for a copy of a treaty with Colombia. I did not ask for it. I was a well-wisher to the request; but the Senator from West Virginia asks the State Department to send the Senate a treaty which we are told has already been negotiated, and which the State Department officials have said in the public prints they are waiting for us to ratify. They are waiting for us to ratify a treaty which has been negotiated. Mr. Sayre says it is a treaty. That is the word he used. The newspaper article says that he has made a treaty, and he is waiting for the Senate to pass the measure ratifying it before he makes it public.

In other words, this cowardly Congress, as he would take us to be, is going to sit here and let him tell us that he has gone ahead and made a treaty, and we do not dare try to see it nor do we dare try to find out what is in it. He has a pickle in the soak for somebody. He is going to put somebody's business in the discard, and we cannot find out what he is going to do to us until he has hung us. That is what is in this proposal; and I resent it, Mr. President. I, for one, believe that we shall have to let the American people become acquainted with this question.

Party does not mean enough to me to make me sacrifice the Constitution of the United States. Party does not mean enough to me to make me go back on the word of my chief. Party does not mean enough to me to make me go back on the platform promises on which we ran in the last campaign; and nothing means enough to me in the matter of government to make me uphold here the proposition that a Senator who asks, "What is the treaty?" cannot find out what the treaty is upon which we are now voting a ratification, if it shall be voted.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. In order that we may have a clear understanding, I wish to read the definition of "treaty" from Bouvier's Law Dictionary:

Treaties are agreements between nations of a general nature bearing upon political or commercial questions, and are distinguished from conventions which are agreements relating to minor or specific subjects, such as consular conventions and postal conventions. The right to negotiate treaties is one of the tests of sovereignty. The king is usually the treaty-making power in a monarchy, subject to the advice of his ministers in constitutional governments, and in a republic the chief executive or some part of the legislature. After treaties have been negotiated and signed, they must be ratified by the proper authorities of each state.

The question I wish to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia is, when will the treaty become a trade agreement, and after this legislation shall have been enacted are we to say that the Colombian treaty is a trade agreement, and therefore is an agreement which does not have to be ratified by the Senate, because we will have abdicated our power over tariff agreements, which are really trade treaties? It seems to me it is a very interesting question as to whether or not we ought to call this a treaty or a trade agreement.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, my response to the distinguished Senator from Iowa is that, in my judgment, it will be interpreted by the Department of State to be a trade agreement, and I do not think it has ever been intended that this treaty should be submitted to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. DICKINSON. In other words, when it is black, we may either call it a pot or a kettle, and it is just the same.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator has been very generous, but I should like to interrupt him a moment longer in order to read into the RECORD at this point a short quotation from one of the 14 books of the Bible that was discarded by King James. I should like to read about three lines from the gospel of Baruch, chapter 6.

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. LONG. It reads:

As for their tongue, it is polished by the workman, and they themselves are gilded and laid over with silver; yet are they but false, and cannot speak.

[Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Louisiana referred to the platform and the pledges made by candidates. He also referred to the former position of his party on this particular question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Whose party?

Mr. FESS. We will not name it. If the Senator from Louisiana would consult the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 7291, volume 75, part 7, he would find the record of the vote on the effort to defeat the flexible provision in the act of 1930. That went no further than to give the President power, within limits, after a recommendation of the scientific commission, known as the "Tariff Commission." The provision was so offensive, in attempting to give the President authority, within limits, to act upon the facts gathered by the Tariff Commission, that Senators on the other side wanted to have it provided that such action on the part of the President should always be referred back to this body for approval, before the President's decree should be effective.

The Senator will recall that the present Chairman of the Committee on Finance, our beloved friend, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], offered his famous H.R. 6662 as an amendment, making it mandatory that any such proposed action on the part of the President should come back to the Senate before any decree of the President should be effective.

Upon that proposal 36 Democrats voted in the affirmative, and I notice that 6 Republicans voted with them. Not a single Democrat voted against it, while 30 Republicans voted against it. That was a provision to nullify the grant of a limited power to the President. Now, from the same author, comes the pending proposal, greatly to enlarge the power of the President, to enlarge it far beyond the dream of anybody up to that time, and seemingly all but a few are enthusiastically supporting the proposal, which is diametrically opposed to what was done only 2 years ago.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. How did the Senator from Ohio vote on that amendment?

Mr. FESS. I voted against it, as the Senator would have expected me to vote.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator has reversed his position as much as he claims the Senator from Mississippi has reversed his.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; not in the slightest degree.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the able Senator from Ohio for his contribution. I remember very well the colloquy which took place between the senior Senator from Nebraska and the senior Senator from Kentucky upon the subject at that time on the amendment which would have required that when increases or decreases in tariff rates were recommended by the President as to any item, the entire matter would require the approval of the Senate of the United States. The agreement between the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska and the distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky was that such recommendations would be approved by this body without question.

Mr. President, one of the leading proponents of the reciprocal trade treaties, Mordecai Ezekiel, possibly second in influence with the President, admits, in an article published in what may be termed the "administration's mouthpiece", the weekly publication entitled "Today" of April 21, page 16, edited by Mr. Moley, and published by Vincent Astor, wealthy owner of the floating White House, that some seven or more millions of workers will be threatened with the loss of their employment opportunities, and that a million or more farmers will be forced into other lines of activity.

To me, that is a very far-reaching statement for any man who occupies a responsible position with the Central Government here at Washington. For instance, a farmer who has lived upon his farm for a great number of years knows something about the farming industry, but if he is put into some other industry, he will have to learn that business, and possibly because of the age he has reached he will not be so adept in arriving at a standard of efficiency which will enable him to earn enough to protect and educate his family.

The same applies to the man who has learned his fellow-craft work in the art of making china, or glass, or steel, or pottery, or in any of the various other industries found under the American flag. After they have delved in those industries for long periods of time, it would be indeed difficult for them to learn a new business to such a standard of efficiency that they would be able to satisfy their home demands, or pay off a mortgage, perchance, they may have been liquidating in part while they were occupied in the positions in which they had served as entered apprentices, and earn positions in the industry as master workmen.

Surely, with such pronouncements on the part of those close to the administration, neither industry, labor, nor farmers can be expected to make purchases except for their immediate needs.

Yet, Mr. President, this legislation, which its proponents publicly and freely admit will add some eight or ten millions of our people to those already on the Government charity lists, is labeled "recovery." At a time when every real American realizes that a termination of Federal meddling is of first importance to speedy recovery, we are asked to enact legislation which will unquestionably retard recovery.

It has been the experience of every nation that it is not well to interfere in any way with the principles which protect the industries which give employment and work opportunities today to the industrial workers who live under their flags, but they guard sacredly those work opportunities, and they undertake to increase the work opportunities by reducing the number of hours of labor and protecting the home trade for the industrial workers.

This legislation will not encourage recovery, except for foreign nations. How? By laying down the bars permitting the importer to claim the market here under the American flag which is now enjoyed by the toilers of this Nation. Some international financers may be benefited and comparatively few Americans engaged in business of exporting and importing will reap the reward.

A few days ago Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, in a radio broadcast, criticized our failure to follow in the footsteps of England in dealing with international trade. England, and those who operate her governmental machinery, were pointed out as having laid down certain principles which our Government and our people could well afford to emulate.

The fact is that England after 100 years of free trade has now adopted an intra-Empire protective tariff, and we all know how far England in her progress toward recovery has forged ahead of America.

On that very day, a matter of hours before the radio talk of Secretary Wallace, England, to protect the employment opportunities of her own people and the markets of the British Commonwealth of Nations from the ruthless, cutthroat competition of the low wage paid and low living standards of the workers of Japan, had publicly served notice on Japan of the possible severance of trade relations between the Empire on one hand and Japan on the other.

How different, Mr. President, is the attitude of Great Britain as compared with the attitude of the authorities in the United States of America, when the same power under the Industrial Recovery Act is reposed in the Chief Executive of this Nation.

England, the Government which Secretary Wallace asks that we emulate, faced with increasing unemployment among her workers, due to underselling on the part of the Japanese, not only served notice of substantially increased import duties on imports from Japan, but, in reality, served notice of an embargo against the products of Japan.

However, though Congress granted a similar embargo power to the President in 1933, the President did not take advantage of protecting the industries of America which are languishing today. For instance, the match industry is practically out of commission, having only a fraction of the market here in America. This situation was recognized by Congress when, in the Revenue Act of 1934, it increased the excise tax on colored-stem matches; but the increase was not sufficient to bar all the cheap foreign competition in this field.

Japan, because of the cheap wage paid the Japanese workmen, can sell matches at 30 percent less than the cost of the production of the American match. The same is true, Mr. President, of the china and the pottery industries. The same is also true of some portions of the fish industry, particularly on the Pacific coast, involving the great State of Washington, the great State of Oregon, and the great State of California.

Is it possible that any Member of this body who believes that we should reduce or eliminate our tariff duties on the more than 300 industries, articles, or commodities which I enumerated on May 1 will contend that such action would be in line with the administration's understanding of the meaning of the word "recovery"?

Mr. President, the sincerity of those who cry "recovery", while urging upon the Congress the enactment of one-man tariff dictatorship, can well be questioned.

Our recovery has been seriously retarded by the insistence of the administration that we legislate at the present moment on tariff changes.

Indeed, evidence is piling up that the tariff program and other blunders are delaying recovery in this country to such an extent that we are falling far behind other leading countries in our efforts at recovery from the world-wide, war-caused depression.

As evidence of this fact, Mr. President, I present a table issued by the League of Nations on this subject for the year ending 1933, and ask that it be considered as a part of my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Indices of industrial production (1928=100)—Issued by League of Nations

	United States	Canada	England	France	Germany	Japan	Sweden	Russia
January 1933	59	52	90	78	62	117	83	212
December 1933	68	72	97	83	72	[1] 139	95	[2] 237
Gain	9	20	7	5	10	22	12	25

[1] November. [2] October.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is interesting to note that at the end of the year 1933 the United States had the lowest index of industrial production, that is, it was the greatest distance below the normal of 1928 production of any of the countries listed above.

During the year 1933 the United States made a gain of 9 points, and, with the exception of England and France, this was the lowest gain in industrial production of any of the countries listed. England's small gain of 7 points is due to the fact that she did not have very far to go to reach normal, as she started the year with an index of 90.

Mr. President, I think we are pretty well agreed that relief must be provided and is of first importance, although we may differ somewhat on details. But I desire to stress the thought that recovery should then command our attention, with only incidental consideration for socialistic reform, which can better be attended to when we are well on our way back to reasonable prosperity. Not only are we hounded to pass reform measures, but now we are thrown headlong into a partisan political controversy as old as the life of the Nation—the tariff question. Surely, there can be but little merit, either from the standpoint of relief, recovery, or reform in bringing into question constitutional government, delegation of legislative functions, abolition of congressional duties, revision of tariff procedure, and taxation. We are here called upon—in the midst of other pressing duties—to pass upon the merits of (1) free trade, (2) tariff for revenue only, (3) competitive tariffs, and (4) reciprocal tariffs versus the long-established protective-tariff policy of this country. It is neither right nor wise in this hour of our country's peril to demand it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I desire to show, although very few of my Democratic colleagues are here, how consistent the RECORD shows what my position was. I think I have stated on every possible occasion in the Senate that I was a tariff Democrat, in favor of tariffs; and yet when we had before us in 1931 the tariff bill on which we voted on the 1st day of April, 1932, introduced for the purpose of repealing the flexible provision of the Tariff Act, I was one of the Democrats who, while a tariff man, voted to repeal it on the ground that it lodged in the Executive tariff-making power, which ought to be retained by Congress. My vote is shown on page 7291 of the RECORD. We had speeches made on the subject at that time by illustrious Senators. I quote a sentence from one of our theme speeches, made by one of the Democratic Senators from the State of Texas, who said:

> This is the most outrageous doctrine that has ever been uttered during the course of the present debate.

We were all applauding that sentiment here, and we were all undertaking to wrench this terrible power from the President. This was known, and was pronounced by the Republicans to be a gesture of the Democratic Party; but it was explained in the debates at the time that it was desired to put the matter before the American people, that we should not go further, as the iniquitous thing then before Congress proposed, but that we should repeal what had already been done.

Here in the RECORD is my vote with the rest of them, all of us voting that we would not have this kind of thing.

All of us went before the people and said that we were going to repeal it. Every one of us did. If there is a single one who did not do it, I do not know who he is. Every one of them did it, unanimously. Here is the record of what we did, in which it is shown that I was standing here defending the faith of the party.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 7291, appears the list of the distinguished and illustrious Democrats whom I followed. I followed their words, I followed their instructions, and I followed their votes. I went down the line with them. Now I call for my leaders; I call for the men who poured this inspiration into me in campaign after campaign.

Where is the leader?

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator give the volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to which he just referred?

Mr. LONG. Yes. This is the RECORD of April 1, 1932, at page 7291.

We now come back for leaders, and where have the leaders gone?

The situation reminds me of a tombstone which was erected down in my country for a man who had died. Before his death he had instructed his wife that when he died she should put on his tombstone the inscription which he left for her. It consisted of a little verse which he had written. So, in accordance with his instructions, there was engraved on the tombstone these words:

Remember, man, as you pass by,
So as you are, so once was I.
So as I am, so you must be.
Prepare to die and follow me!

The old woman put that on the tombstone, but she did not want to be bound by the injunction "to follow me"; so she put two little lines beneath it in her own behalf:

To follow you I'm not content,
Until I know which way you went.

[Laughter.]

Now, which way have my leaders gone, Mr. President? Where are they?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I answer the Senator from Louisiana? When this power was given the Republican President it was given to him for the purpose of raising the tariff duties, and we all know it. There is not any doubt about it. We all know exactly the purpose for which the power was given him. The power which is given the present President is to decrease tariff duties. That is what is troubling the Senator from Louisiana, who is a tariff advocate, and that is what is troubling the Senators on the other side.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator from Tennessee interpret the present law to mean that the President cannot reduce the tariff duties?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not interpreting the present law, and I have not been asked to do it; but I know that most of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber are for high tariffs, that they are in favor of making them as high as possible, and if they had the slightest idea that Franklin Roosevelt was going to raise tariff rates instead of lower them they would, every one of them, be in favor of this measure.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; we would not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That was not the problem which was disturbing the Senator from Tennessee when the bill having to do with the flexible tariff provisions was before the Senate. It was not a question of whether the rates were going up or going down that was then disturbing the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the only thing that disturbed me.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have the floor for the moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was referring to me and pointing at me, and I thought I might reply.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not finished, and I hope the Senator from Tennessee will get the full text before he preaches.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will preach with or without.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator was not disturbed about whether rates were going up or going down, I repeat, but this is what the Senator was disturbed about; and I am quoting his very eloquent address on September 26, 1929:

The minute, Mr. President, you take from the people the right of their representatives to levy taxes and put that right in the hands of a man who can practically perpetuate himself in office for 8 years, you repeal the thirteenth amendment in effect, because we are all economic slaves, and the only difference is that we have a little hope in 8 years of removing our bonds, where under most forms of slavery that hope cannot be entertained.

Mr. President, so far as I was concerned, it seemed to me that, so long as the Congress had written a firm formula under which this power was to be used, it was not a delegation of the taxing power; but the Senator from Tennessee thought that even the limited flexing of the tariff under that rule was a delegation of the taxing power and with all the great vigor at his command he undertook to convince the Senate of the fact. He was not worrying about whether rates were going up or going down, so far as his argument was concerned; he was worrying about the fundamental question of the delegation of the taxing power; and the pending measure delegates twice as much, yea, 50 times as much taxing power as did that provision of the law to which he objected heretofore.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan and others who believe as he does were perfectly willing—and voted that way when the occasion offered—to give the President the power when they thought their own President was going to raise the tariff rates. We all know that. Why try to dissemble and argue constitutional questions? It is a fact that they voted for that bill then because they thought their President would raise the tariff rates. Is there a Senator here who denies that?

Mr. HATFIELD. Oh, yes, there is; I deny it. The Senator from Tennessee is not fair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator let me answer the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator from Tennessee is not fair.

Mr. McKELLAR. In what respect?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I say the Senator from Tennessee is not fair, and the statement he has made reflects upon a President who has passed into history and whose inclination upon the subject as was apparent, was toward lower rates than those found in the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. There is no one better informed upon the subject of the commitments and the convictions of President Hoover in that regard than is the senior Senator from Tennessee. I now yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee, though, has not answered the point that connects me. I am an injured, innocent person in this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think anybody could do that. If anybody could stop the Senator from Louisiana, I do not know whom he could be.

Mr. LONG. The injury that my friend from Tennessee does me is that I came here a young man out of the country to follow him, and I did follow him and the other leaders on this side. My first vote——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has fallen by the wayside so frequently lately that I cannot any longer find my follower.

Mr. LONG. No; the trouble is, Mr. President, that my leader is gone off after a false god, while I am still going down the line with my original convictions. I came here a tariff Democrat; everybody knew I was a tariff Democrat; and I said so when I came; yet when we had the bill up to repeal the flexible tariff provision, on the ground that it was abdicating the functions of Congress to the President of the United States, here is the vote of the Senator from Louisiana along with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], voting for the reason expressed, that it was an absolutely outrageous procedure to take the power out of the hands of Congress. I voted with my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I have not the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I say to the Senator from Louisiana that is one of the very few times I have ever known him to be right.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator from Tennessee always votes with me once on each question. The Senator from Tennessee is bound to be right half the time, because, as a rule, he votes on each question on both sides of the fence, and so the Senator from Tennessee can always claim that he is at least half right, because so long as I have observed my friend I am with him at least one time and against him at least one time on every question.

In this case my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I believe, offered the amendment, and here is the speech of the Senator from Tennessee saying that we were placing this matter before the country to show that the Democratic Party was for the repeal of this thing root and branch. Here I was, a tariff Democrat, standing up for the Constitution of the United States, sitting at the feet of the Senator from Tennessee and his allies, listening to the voice of freedom, inhaling the pure air of lawful government; and then I turn around, after having undertaken to imbibe that spirit, and find that my leader has gone, and that my leader is denouncing me here because I do not go with him. Where is he going next week? Mr. President, it reminds me of a man trying to find the North Pole. He does not know whether he is within 6 miles of it or not unless he meets somebody coming back from it. I have to meet the Senator from Tennessee coming back in order to know whether I am on the right road. Whenever I see the Senator coming back from where he was last week, I know I have not changed.

The Senator was not alone in this matter. I have just read from the declarations of our President, of the other Senator from Tennessee at that time, who is now Secretary of State, and now I am here, a tariff Democrat, voting as I always voted—voting with my party that Congress should legislate on the revenue. Here is my vote; here it is, the same as when I started, and here is the declaration of my party that they would repeal this thing; here is the declaration of our candidate, here is the declaration of our Vice President, and here is the declaration of our Secretary of State.

Shall one who has voted in this way and who has made such a promise to come here now and not only change his position, with that promise staring him in the face, but to do three times the evil that has already been done under the law we promised to repeal? I think it is just a question of time when my friend from Tennessee is going to get off and think this thing over, and when he does his conscience is going to govern him, because we all know that the Senator has a conscience. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from West Virginia replied to what I think was a very unfortunate statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] when he asserted that the only interest we on this side could have in the flexible-tariff authority given to the Executive was to increase tariff rates. I have an authoritative statement here that I want to put in the RECORD, if the Senator from West Virginia will permit me to do so.

Mr. HATFIELD. I shall be very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. FESS. I read from the veto message of President Hoover on House bill 6662, entitled "An act to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes", a bill for which the Senator from Tennessee voted and which was calculated to secure a continuance of logrolling in this body, a practice which we were trying to get rid of when the flexible-tariff provisions were written into the law. This will be an answer to the Senator's statement that we had no interest except an increased tariff rate, and, if there were no opportunity to bring that about, we would never vote for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator proceeds to read the quotation will he yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FESS. I will yield in a few moments. I quote as follows:

> The broad purpose of the present form of Executive action upon the flexible provision is promptly to remedy inequities and injustices in the tariff as they may be discovered; to prevent any tariff system being frozen upon the Nation despite economic shifts; and by providing this flexibility to meet changing economic conditions greatly to lessen the necessity for periodic general revision of the tariff, with its disturbance to economic life and its orgy of politics and logrolling. The flexible provision has, since the act of 1930, proved its high usefulness in these particulars. The Commission has completed or has in progress investigations covering 291 different articles. Of those which come under the flexible provisions, the recommendations were for no change in about 54 percent of the cases, increases in 16 percent, and decreases in 30 percent, which were placed in effect within a few days.

Instead of the charge made by the Senator from Tennessee being true that the flexible provision was designed to increase tariff rates, the vast majority of the actions of the Chief Executive were in the direction of decreasing rates under the flexible tariff provision. Let that be an answer to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HATFIELD. That was a strong reason why the then President of the United States insisted upon the flexible-tariff provision's going into the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act.

Mr. FESS. That was the main object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me to enable me to ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am going to ask the Senator from Ohio, does he believe in reducing the tariff rates generally?

Mr. FESS. Why, certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is not a tariff——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator from West Virginia will permit me——

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I believe in the tariff philosophy that was suggested by James A. Garfield many years ago, and in that system of protection which ultimately leads to the nearest possible free trade. The Senator from Tennessee knows that in the evolution of economic forces, no matter how high rates may be at one time or how low they may be at another time, if they are too high when we have fully developed economic efficiency in production, it is necessary then to reduce them. That is the philosophy of the protective system.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not now talking about the philosophy; I am talking about certain facts. Is it not true that the Senator from Ohio has voted for every high tariff bill that has been passed since he has been in either House of Congress?

Mr. FESS. And in each successive case the tariff bill provided lower rates than the preceding tariff bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator voted for the higher tariff rates.

Mr. FESS. I voted for a protective tariff as against a competitive tariff.

Mr. McKELLAR. And he has voted against every low tariff and every Democratic tariff bill since he has been a Member of Congress.

Mr. FESS. Certainly; and I would vote against any free-trade tariff bill or tariff-for-revenue-only bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield further to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. The point to which I now want to get the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to bring his mind back is this. I am going to read from the Democratic platform of 1932. The tariff plank read this way:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference.

That is the Democratic platform which I helped to write and which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] helped to write.

Mr. HATFIELD. Of 1932?

Mr. LONG. Yes; the year of our Lord 1932.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator from Louisiana believe in that provision of the platform?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, why does not the Senator vote for it? Why is he on the other side? He is just like every other Senator from Louisiana in the last half century. Because sugar is produced in his State he is voting for every high-tariff bill the Republicans bring forward.

Mr. LONG. There is no one so blind as the man who will not see. The Senator has made a charge against me——

Mr. McKELLAR. Not only against the Senator, but all other Senators from Louisiana since I have been a Member of Congress. The Senator from Louisiana to whom I am addressing these remarks, and all other Senators from Louisiana, have uniformly lined up for a high tariff every time the Republican Party has introduced a high-tariff bill. The Senator has fought the Democratic Party consistently ever since he has been here because he is in favor of a high tariff for the purpose of protecting his own little pet industry in Louisiana. Those are the facts, and everybody knows them to be the facts. Why try to talk around them by saying there is some constitutional question involved? The Senator does not pay a particle of attention to the Constitution, and the Republicans do not pay a particle of attention to the Constitution when it is in their way.

Mr. LONG. Here is where my friend from Tennessee needs to go back to school. I know he is going to rise within the next 5 minutes and beg the pardon of the Senate and of myself for what he just said. Former Senators Ransdell and Broussard both voted for the flexible-tariff provision in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just like all the Republicans did.

Mr. LONG. I went before the people of Louisiana and defeated both of those gentlemen.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it is a fact the Senator did not defeat them on the tariff issue. If he had made that an issue, he would not have defeated them and he would not be here now.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes. I did not defeat them on the tariff issue as such, but I did make it a point that in voting to abdicate the function of Congress and place it in the hands of the President, those two gentlemen had shown the people of Louisiana that they were not competent to represent them. I came here to fill the seat of Senator Ransdell. Senator Ransdell voted for the flexible provision in the tariff bill so the President and the Tariff Commission could fix the rates. I came here, and what was the first thing I did? Did I do what the Senator from Tennessee said? No; I voted to undo what Ransdell and Broussard and every other Louisiana Senator had done.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the Senator did that when he first came here, but as soon as he felt the ground under his feet he voted against the Democrats, went over on the other side and voted with the Republicans, and he has been with them ever since. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. No. The Senator talks one way, but he goes another way, as I have said.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. I am here on the Democratic side and everybody knows it. I have stood with the party all my life, and I am going to stand with it all the remainder of my life. I am not like the Senator from Louisiana, jumping up on one side at one time and on the other side at another time.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; the Senator from Tennessee always has the Democratic flag up. I admit that. But here is what the Democratic Party in its platform said:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference.

That is the platform of the Democratic Party, and here is what Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt said on July 30, 1932, and which he is absolutely dishonoring this afternoon:

> It is a difficult and highly technical matter, but a commission of experts can be trusted to find the facts, and the facts should be left to speak for themselves.

And then the platform said:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference.

Now, get the words of the Democratic platform again:

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people.

Can anyone imagine a thing like that? [Laughter.] Yet the Senator from Tennessee says he is a good Democrat.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, we can imagine a thing just like that. The Senator from Louisiana and Republican Senators are opposed to President Roosevelt having this power because they are afraid he is going to reduce tariff duties. The Senator from Louisiana is particularly afraid because his little pet industry of sugar down in Louisiana will have a lowered tariff rate, perhaps. That is the only thing that hurts or worries the Senator from Louisiana. If it were not for sugar he would probably be standing just like he stood when he first came here, on the Democratic side. But sugar! Sugar! Just mention sugar to anybody from Louisiana, and they want to be on the Republican side and not on the Democratic side. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATFIELD. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question? Would the Senator from Tennessee be willing to give to a Republican President the same power he is seeking to have given to a Democratic President?

Mr. McKELLAR. If he were one like President Hoover, I am frank to say to the Senator from West Virginia, I would not be willing. I would not vote for it under any such circumstances.

Mr. HATFIELD. Can the Senator from Tennessee suggest any Republican President to whom he would be willing to give that power?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes. If HIRAM JOHNSON were President, if GEORGE W. NORRIS were President, if WILLIAM E. BORAH were President, or even if ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG were President, I would be glad to give the power to them; but I would not think of doing it for the rank and file on the Republican side of the Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to finish what I was endeavoring to state when the Senator from Tennessee interrupted me?

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes; I am very glad to yield further to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Here is what the Democratic Party said. I am reading this only because I want the Senator from Tennessee to understand that it is a promise of the party—the Democratic Party—to tell the truth. The Senator from Tennessee may not believe that it is in the platform, but the party did say that it ought to keep its word. It said that. Whether the Senator from Tennessee knows it or not, it is Democratic philosophy, according to the platform, to do what we tell the people we are going to do. There are a lot of folks who do not believe in that principle. However, here is what the Democratic Party said in its platform in 1932:

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when intrusted with power and that the people are entitled to know—

Just think of that!

> The people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe.

And then the platform went on to say:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference.

And my friend from Tennessee still thinks he is a Democrat. [Laughter.] There is no way to convince him otherwise. He said if I was a good Democrat I would be over here like I was the last time. He was with me on this very issue then. I was with him in urging that the tariff-making power ought not to be placed in the hands of the President of the United States. I was for protecting sugar, just as he charges. I was a tariff Democrat, just as he charges, just the kind of a Democrat that will keep the party alive.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know there were any such.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; Henry Jackson, from Tennessee, was one of the best we ever had.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Louisiana a question at that point?

Mr. LONG. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. Is it not a fact that every Democratic Senator, representing a State that is Democratic, voted, as is disclosed by the RECORD, for protection for those industries in his own State and for those commodities produced within the confines of his State?

Mr. LONG. That is true in every case with the exception of one Senator, and I have always wondered just what was wrong with him. [Laughter.] Every Democrat here, as will be disclosed by the RECORD, voted to protect the industries in his own State, with the exception of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. He is the only man who voted otherwise. He voted for the immigration law, which would have kept cheap labor from coming in here.

Mr. SMITH. And to keep some others from coming into the country as well.

Mr. LONG. But all Democrats are in favor of protecting the products of their own States. As an example, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and I voted to protect oil. We voted to protect the copper of Arizona. Why? Because we needed the copper votes to get a tariff on oil and they needed the oil votes to get a tariff on copper. [Laughter.] There is the hocus-pocus about this thing. That is the way it was done. I am perfectly willing to stand here and tell the Senate that I voted for the other man's tariff because we needed his vote to get the tariff on our products.

Mr. McKELLAR. Sugar! [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Yes, sugar. What could be more noble than a tariff on sugar? [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me?

Mr. HATFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Louisiana is making the most powerful argument for the pending bill that could be made. Congress, when it makes a tariff bill, almost necessarily does so on the log-rolling principle. The pending measure provides a scientific way to handle tariffs. That is why I am in favor of the pending bill.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is probably for this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I know, and the Senate knows, that Congress will not grant a proper tariff on copper. I know, and the Senate knows, that when the keen mind of the President and his tariff experts consider copper, they will increase the tariff on copper.
